DR. GUS MILLER

Well folks, politics is getting hot. Bob Reid had his picture in the papers last week. All three county papers seem to be for him; which will mean that he has it in the bag already. His picture looked fine, and of course Bob is a fine man. I was asking one of the politicians on the street what about the race, and he said we better all get together on Bob. Said one thing about him is that you don't have to worry about how he will stand; that he will be for the right thing. These politicians you have to wait and see about the planks they say ther're goin to stand on, ain't worth votin for anyhow. We can all count on Reid and that is what made me decide at the last moment to throw the entire weight of this column to him. He stands for Shelby County; he has been a good citizen and will make a good public servant. He has stood for everything uplifting to Montevallo. Folks, decide now before the whole atmosphere gets full of smoke, to vote for this man; and stick to it. Boy, wasn,t Bibb Graves tellin' them on the streets of Montevallo! If he had any more pep durin the war its a wonder he didn't go after the Kaiser by himself! Bibb explained to some of the boys, so one said, about platforms: "You know a train has a little addition on at the back with a shed over it, and steps leadin' up to it. You use it to get on the train. If you get on you will see in small letters on the door this sign: "A violation of the law to stand on the platform'! That's how it is with most politicians" said the little Colonel," and "the next Governor" as the boys was callin him when I came into town Friday night. Glad I missed him; he has a very winning personality; it would of been hard for me to tell him quite frankly that, things bein as is now, I can't support him in these columns; I'm still for a lady to run this race. We're working on a platform now for her. After she gets in, the Lord only knows what she'll do, but maybe she'll do better than some men could do. Bibb will understand my frankness and go ahead and make the best race he can. I believe no other man will dare enter the race when we get Bibb and a good strong woman runnin.

Palitically yours,
Gus.

J. C. Chandler, 45, former vice-president of Acme Oil Company of Alabama, died at his residence in Birmingham, following an attack of heart trouble.

Col. Leo Strossburger, 71, prominent business and civic leader of Montgomery, died at his home. Physicians said death was due to spinal meningitis.

HON. BIBB GRAVES VISITS IN MONTEVALLO

Friday, November 24, the Hon. Bibb Graves, candidate for Governor of Alabama, was in Montevallo shaking hands with his many friends He has been in Montevallo a number of times and knows a great many of the citizens. Everywhere he went a crowd soon gathered to talk with him.

Graves is the only man who has yet qualified for the forthcoming Governor's race. Others have put out "feelers" from time to time, but none have defintely announced their candidacy. It seems quite certain, however, that several will enter the race.

Hon. Graves is as lively as ever; he literally bubbles over with energy. His wit and humor are hardly matched in Alabama, He kept his crowd well entertained wherever he went in Montevallo, and there was always a crowd. Part of time Bob Reid, candidate for the legislature, and Graves were together. The Montevallo Times had just come off the press when the next Governor came into town. All up and down the street citizens were reading about Reid's candidacy and looking at his picture on the front page. When "the next Governon," as many referred to, Graves, entered town, the policital pot begin to boil sure enough.

Among many interesting statements and observations quoted on the streets after Graves' departure was this message which the former Governor recently sent to a prospective opponent in the forthcoming race. Meeting a mutual friend in Montgomery Mr, Graves asked "will you take my good friend (Blank) a message, and repeat it just as I give it to you?" Receiving an affirmative reply, "the next Governor of Alabama" said: Tell him it has been a long time since we both studied the old blue-back speller. I've forgotten most of the words we studied there and I suppose he has. I want to remind him that in the back of that old speller were some fables. One of Aesops fables I want him to turn back and read carefully. It says:

Once there was a dog that had a great big bone with a lot of fine juicy meat on it. He had the bone with the juicy meat in his mouth and started across a clear stream of water, Looking down into the water he saw another dog with what he thought to be bigger and better bone of meat; he jumped at the dog in the water and grabbed at his bone. He came up out of the water with no bone whatever."

Please tell him to ponder well this fable; the moral is perfectly clear."

Indeed it would seem that the moral is clear if his appearance in Montevallo is any sign of his statewide popularity. Men from all walks of life, miners, farmers, merchants, professional such as doctors and teachers—all seemed enthusiastic about "the little Colonel."

"What do you think of him" asked a reporter of a merchant? "I believe it'll be a walkover for Graves." he replied,

"What do you think", to a miner and a farmer? "He's a smart man; he'll do what he says he will, and he knows how to talk to the common man," they said.

A traveling man who was in town on Sunday said he had been over a good bit of the territory recently and unless something unforeseen comes into the picture Graves will be elected by a great majority regardless of who enters the race against him; that all classes are for him and they are voting for the man and don't care about the platform.

It will be interesting to see what happens when the others begin to announce. "The other boys don't know what to do; they need a platform; Bibb Graves is his own platform." This is how one citizen summed up the situation Saturday night.

Says Maya Civilization Choked Itself to Death

A new explanation of why the great Maya civilization of Central America, undoubtedly the highest of prehistoric America, suddenly faded and vanished without any obvious reason was suggested to the Washington Academy of Sciences by Dr. C. Wythe Cooke of the United States geological survey, the Literary Digest reports. Says Dr. E. E. Free, in his Week's Science (New York):

"The Maya civilization choked itself to death, Doctor Cooke believes, with mud washed from its own hillside corn patches. The former Maya country is marked today, Doctor Cooke reports, by many small, flat plains of sticky clay soil, almost impassable in wet weather. Each of these plains, he believes, once was a small lake, these lakes being connected by streams or by short portages forming a system

Montevallo Post Enjoy Turkey Dinner At Legion Hut

Hendriok-Hudson Post No. 96 of the American Legion held its regular meeting in our new Hut on Wednesday night November 22nd, and started its drive for members for the new vear. For our speaker we had the pleasure to have with us Comrade Taylor Boyd of Sylacauga, who gave us in detail the program as outlined by the State and Nationally. He spoke in detail as to the way and manner the State Department is trying to have a special session of the Legislature to relieve the the crisis that faces the schools in this State. After this we had the pleasure to have Dr. J. I. Reid, Mayor of our Town who spoke as to his opinion as to the program that is being sponsored by the Legion and that he would assure us that they would do what they could to help in carrying out the program. Then we were served with a turkey dinner by members of the Auxiliary which was enjoyed by all, as well as was the entertainment furnished by our Adjutant, Dr. James.

We are very anxious to have all the ex-veterans to join our Post or the one nearest you. Attention was called to the fact that since we have our Hut that we are from time to time to have different kinds of good entertainment, and all veterans having a 1934 card will be admitted on one half the regular admission price. This of course means to all the Post members regardless of where they belong. Join now and get your new card as the Legion needs you and you need the Legion.

Live In Dugouts.

"While snow houses, or igloos, are always associated with Eskimos, about half the Eskimo world does not know them at all. Igloos are almost never used in Labrador or in Alaska. Where the white man's frame house is not obtainable the native Eskimo lives in a dugout covered with sod, the roof being supported by poles or animal bones. In the summer the skin tent, or tupic, is used, particularly while on hunting forays.

"The igloo, perhaps the most unusual of all dwellings, is made of blocks of snow, with a clear piece of ice for a window. Beds and benches are of ice, with warm furs on top. A shallow pan made of stone or iron, shaped somewhat like a dustpan, is used for a lamp or stove. Along the flat side is a dry moss for a wick. Inside the pan is seal oil. The cooking kettle is suspended above the pan. Iron kettles and pans are of recent use, and are acquired from the white man, because the Eskimo has no iron, and very little wood.

"In Greenland and Labrador Eskimos have known white men for nearly 900 years, but there are still, in some parts of the Arctic, Eskimos who have seen only an occasional explorer. White men's diseases have killed more than two-thirds of all Eskimos since the first contacts with them, but the population is now about stationary.

"Except in Alaska, Eskimos do not live along regular steamship or tourist routes. The Eskimo seldom can be induced to leave his northland, and the few who have been lured away have returned as quickly as possible."

Herkimer, N. Y.—Joseph Vincent, thirty-five years old, arrested on a charge of disorderly conduct on complaint of his wife, told police he would hang himself if put behind the bars. The police laughed. Ten minutes later Chief Keller found him suspended by his neck from the top of his cell block by his necktie.

Eourth District Meeeting Legion Auxiliary

On Tuesday November 28, Fourth District Conference American Legion Auxiliary met in regular session at Hotel St. George. The convention was called to order at ten o'clock by Mrs. M. P. Jeter, District Director,

The impressive formal induction of the Auxiliary was participated in by twenty-four delegates and visitors. Unit reports showed special emphasis on Junior organization and larger membership.

Mrs. C. L. Salter of Talladega, Department President in her inspiring way conveyed new developments from the recent National President's and Secretaries' Conference in Indianapolis. Closer contact of the committees on Fidac Americanism and National Defense, with the idea of better international relations, and no war or offer of war. Mrs. Salter said "The Auxiliary believes that America will seek war with no nation, and surely no nation will seek war with a prepared America." Rehabitation and child welfare ever the center of the Auxiliary activity offers the broad program for every veteran and every child, but more especially for the disabled veteran and the underprivileged child of a veteran.

Legislation was ably discussed by Miss Maude McClure Kelly of Birmingham, department legislative chairman where she told of the all importance of immediate help for those needy veterans who are victims of the economy program and seemingly await new legislation in the next Congress, which convenes in January.

Other inspiring messages were brought by Mrs. L. M. [illegible] Bessemer, department Secretary-Treasurer, and Mrs. Smilie, clerk of the municipal court of Birmingham, who is legislative chairman for her third district.

Luncheon was served in the hotel dining room at a beautifully appointed table, with decorations in accord with the Thanksgiving season. Dr. James and Mr. Reese Wooley representing the local post were present for the luncheon.

Many friends of Mrs. O. B. Cooper are glad that she can be out again after her recent extended illness.

Pioneer Mince Pies

Tradition states that mince pies were originally oval in shape, to represent the cradle in which the Holy Child was laid, and the medieval cooks filled them with the choicest and costliest of meats, all shredded and minced together, as emblems of the gifts of the Three Wise Men. For centuries they occupied the place of honor on the baronial table, and in an old Fourteenth century manuscript we find the following recipe: "Take a pheasant, a hare, a capon, and two pigeons, take out as many bones as may be, and chop them up fine, add the livers and hearts, two kidneys of sheep, salt, pepper, spice, and vinegar. Put the meat into a crust made craftily into the likeness of a bird's body, close it up and bake well."

Poetic Tribute Paid to the "Beauty of Words"

"Words are such precious things! They laugh and dance and shout with glee! and some have golden wings; others are quiet and friendly like a tree. There is a word that sings; another croons most tenderly or with high courage rings. Some are arrayed so gorgeously; others wear gentle colors, like a nun; or full of vigor like a noonday sun. Some words there are like fine and rich brocade; others like stars do shine; some are alluring like a piece of jade, and some are ruby red, like wine.

"Lo! There are words as still as night, and words that lie in love against the breast, and there are those that wheel like hawks in flight—and those that bring deep rest. So many things God made to give delight; blossoms of bright hue, the song of birds, the midnight sky with silver gems bedight—but none so lovely as his gift of words."

Takes Seventeen Years for Locust to Mature

The 17-year locusts, as the insect known to science as the cicada is called, appears in the North more often than every 17 years, but this is due to the fact that there are several cycles of them in existence. The cicadas actually require 17 years to mature from the egg stage to the final stage of the full-grown insect. In the South the period is about four years shorter.

The adults lay the eggs in slits in the bark of twigs of trees. When the eggs hatch, the young is a nymph with legs, but no wings. They drop from the tree to the ground and, burrowing beneath the soil, reach the roots where they find their sustenance during the years they are progressing toward maturity.

When the 17 years have been accomplished they work to the surface, and their shell coating splits, permitting the full-grown insect to emerge.

Hand of Time Falls on Historic Scottish Oak

The old "Convenanters' oak" at Dalzell, Scotland, which has weathered the blasts of storm and time for centuries, met with mishap recently. A violent windstorm bereft the famous "auld aik tree of Dalyel" of much of its ancient grandeur. The "Preachers oak," as it is sometimes called, is known to visitors and picnic parties to the beautiful seat of Lord Hamilton of Dalzell as an object of great historic interest. In the troublous religious times of long ago it is on record that the ousted minister of Dalzell was sheltered and protected by the laird of Dalzell as far as possible, and that he secretly visited the parish and preached to his people from the great oak in front of Dalzell house. The great branches of the tree—each the size of an ordinary tree—grow from the top of the stem, which at four and a half feet from the ground is twenty-one feet in circumference.

Royal Spanish Woman Is Forced to Sell Villa

Fontainebleau. — Infanta Eulalie, sixty-seven-year-old aunt of King Alfonso, who lived in a Paris convent as a voluntary exile for many years before events drove the royal family from Spain, has decided to offer her palatial villa and park at San Sebastian for sale in order to assure her of an independent income for life.

"I have few desires in this world and will be content to live on in this convent until I die, but I cannot afford to keep up the taxes on my properties in Spain, so I have decided to sell the villa at San Sebastian, which I have not used for many years," Infanta Eulalie said.

California Roadway Cuts Through Indian Cemetery

Mountain View, Calif.—Where once the Fisher Indians buried their dead, a new highway cuts through, symbolic of the progress that drove the tribe from its once vast hunting ground. Road crews working on the new Bay shore highway recently uncovered the graves of five of the Indians, together with beads, mortars, and other paraphernalia buried with them to insure their happiness and comfort in the Happy Hunting Ground. The bones and other remnants were reburied alongside the right of way.

Norwegians Score as Most Generous Tippers

London. — Scandinavians are the world's most generous tippers, hotel servants say.

A poll among waiters, bellhops, chambermaids and other employees of London's leading hostelries showed Norwegians to be the most welcome guests. Other northern European visitors tipped almost as well.

Spaniards were a good second and Germans not far behind. The French and Italians, however, are considered "tight."

Americans, it was found, could not be classified. They tip extravagantly or hardly ever.

Citizenship

"The Constitution of the United States of America," a book published by the government, says on the subject of a person being a citizen of a state without being a United States citizen: "Citizenship in the United States and citizenship in a state are distinct and may be separately acquired. A resident of the District of Columbia may be a citizen of the United States but not a citizen of any state, and it would seem that one might be a citizen of a state without being a citizen of the United States, although the authorities differ on this point."

War Horse Jack Rabbits Eat Kansas Auto Tires

Dodge City, Kan.—The "war horse' jack rabbits have returned to the Kansas prairies. These huge rabbits, which are the size of a small dog and famous for their leaping, are running off the smaller jacks.

Farmers in the Cimarron brakes say the scarcity of green stuff has developed in the war horses a taste for automobile tires and fresh paint. A ranchman found his truck tires in shreds the other morning. The huge rabbits have been known to tackle a coyote and best him.

ALABAMA POWER COMPANY
BIRMINGHAM, ALABAMA

To the Customers of Alabama Power Company:

Although as a result of the depression the company has sustained large losses in income due to the necessity for thousands of customers to discontinue the service and the necessity for thousands who remained customers to cut down on the use of electric current, we have not ourselves cut down on the quality of the service rendered. On the other hand we have endeavored to improve it.

If it were possible to operate our plants three or four days a week as our manufacturing customers have been doing or to supply part time electric service, we could have made substantial savings in operating expenses since 1929. That is impossible because we must supply you with electric service day and night, twenty-four hours each day, for use whenever you see fit to turn on the switch or start a motor.

Electric service is so necessary in present day industrial and living conditions that it must be available constantly for every need at all hours of the day for every day in the year. Therefore, we cannot secure economies in operation by reducing the working days per week or the number of hours we operate per day. We are unable to store our product and await your needs. It must be provided ready to serve you as you need it and it must be used the moment you demand it. As a result, our plants, our lines, our system can never be idle.

In rendering you constant service of a uniform quality we require more than 330 automobiles and trucks, more than 1800 employees with an annual payroll of $2,700,000—all of which is in the State of Alabama.

Yours very truly,

President.

Modern Home Superior to That of the Past

Scientific investigation has punctured the often accepted statement that old-time houses were necessarily better built than modern ones. Just because the timbers were bigger and hand-hewn does not mean that they were more scientifically put together.

Impartial comparison of the work of old builders with that of their modern successors, made by Donald G. Tarpley for the Woman's Home Companion, gave the following interesting results:

"Old houses did not have insulation in the outside walls. Flashing was not so good as it is now. Plastering was inferior. Metal lath was unknown. Chimneys did not have metal throats and frequently several flues ran together. Modern chimneys have terracotta flue lining, which is not only smooth but which in one-inch thickness is equivalent to four inches of brick.

"Floors were usually only one thickness, whereas now we use two layers of board with sound-deadening felt between. The wide floor boards which were so appreciated in old houses were practical in their day because they were laid in houses which were not thoroughly heated. But in modern homes with steam heat wide boards are more likely to swell and open up. They have to be put down by a different process—veneered and screwed in addition to being side-nailed."

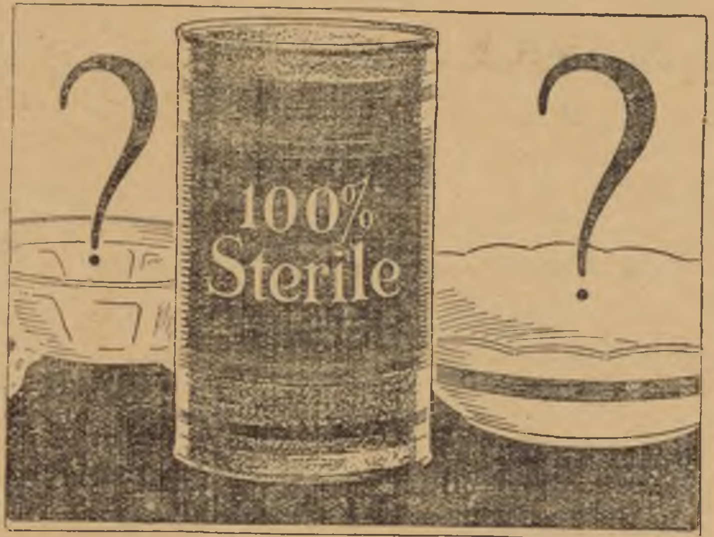
Facts About Foods



THERE are still a few unmodern people who fear to leave canned food in the can after it is opened. Most people know that there can be no safer container but, for the benefit of those unmodern few, we are quoting the positive statement on this subject which E. V. McCollum, Ph.D., Sc.D., of Johns Hopkins University, made not long since in an article in McCall's Magazine.

"In general," he wrote, "foods remain in better condition until eaten if the unused portion is kept in the can. Spoilage results from exposure to dust, air and insects, and to the bacteria with which any dish may be covered. There is nothing about the can which will contribute to the spoilage of food."

If any other evidence than this statement by such an eminent food authority were needed, there is that of Dr. J. C. Geiger, formerly epidemiologist of the United States Public Health Service, and later Assistant Commissioner of Health in Chicago, now Director of Public Health of San Francisco.

An Unfounded Fear

"It must be remembered," he said, "that the inside of the container has been sterilized at the same time as the food it contains and that the dish into which the food is poured is frequently not so sterile as the can itself. If the fear is founded on the belief that the tin lining of the can becomes corroded and yields poisons which may attack the system, it is a fear that is without substantiation by any scientific evidence."

Alaska Gets Back Noted Flag Used at Purchase

Seattle, Wash.—The United States flag that was hoisted on Castle hill, at Sitka, on October 18, 1867, signalizing the transfer of Alaska from Russian to United States sovereignty, at last has been returned to the land which it honored, a gift of the State department to the people of Alaska. It has found a resting place in the territorial museum.

An aged Russian-American resident of Sitka gives the following account of the transfer:

"We saw strange ships in the harbor, and soldiers in strange uniforms; then we learned that Alaska had been sold to the United States.

"The transfer took place in the rain. The soldiers of the Siberian Line Battalion, in dark uniforms trimmed with red, stood at the left side of the flagstaff, the strange soldiers on the right. Captain Peschourov stepped up to the representative of the United States and said: 'By authority of the emperor of all the Russias, I transfer to the United States the territory of Alaska.'

"The czar's flag wrapped itself around the pole while it was being lowered and could not be torn loose. A Russian sailor was sent aloft to bring it down. Captain Peschourov told him to bring it down, but he didn't hear. He tore it from the halyard and dropped it. It fell on the bayonets of the Russian soldiers. Then the strange flag was hoisted amid the cheers of the Americans."

Gay-Colored Bicycles Invade Paris Streets

Paris.—Bright-colored bicycles have become the fad among chic Parisians for Sunday and holiday locomotion.

A boy and girl recently attracting attention were pedaling their yellow and green enameled tandem, dressed in green breeches, yellow and green checked sweaters and caps.

Parking along the curb is becoming a problem.

Advocates Whipping for 16-Year-Old Smugglers

El Paso, Texas.—After sentencing two Mexican boys, both sixteen, to five days in the county jail for smuggling liquor from Mexico, Federal Judge Charles A. Boynton, told them he hoped their parents would give each of them a "sound whipping" after they had served their terms.

Utah Cave May Contain Secret of Ancient Race

Kanab, Utah.—Far back into the mystic shrines of Monument valley, in northern Arizona and southern Utah, there are untold proofs of civilization existing as early as 500 A. D., yet untouched by savants, T. R. Kelley, field director of a group of Arizona and California scientists, who recently explored the 2,000-mile square area, is certain.

Robert Branstead, a member of Kelley's party, challenged great danger and death to slide down a 40-foot rope from the crest to a cave. It was located deep in the solitude of Monument valley, into which no white man has dared to wander because of evil repute among natives.

There he found what Kelley believes were two pieces of pottery of the basketmaker type, known to have been made about 500 A. D. The room he discovered was bored into almost solid rock, much in the manner known to have been used at that prehistoric date. No tools or implements were found, however. The entrance to the cave was blocked almost completely by great boulders that had dropped into position and wedged tightly.

The cave evidently had been the resting place for animals during past centuries. Many bones littered the floor, and here and there was scattered evidence of a death battle between great beasts of early days.

Queen Sells Paintings

Amsterdam.—Exhibition of paintings by Queen Wilhelmina of Holland realized 10,500 florins (about $4,200) which the queen donated for relief of poor families.

Life-Long Hobo Advises Boys to Stay at Home

Salt Lake City.—Since he was a seven-year-old boy Thomas Whitlock, eighty-three, has been traveling about the United States. In Salt Lake City recently he remarked that he expects to continue his hobo life for at least 20 more years.

Food is more difficult to get now, he says, although he adds that he hasn't worked a day in 43 years and has never gone hungry. He advises boys to "get off the road," remarking that a lesson he learned too late is that men should stay in one place and work hard at honest toil.

Snake Kept as Pet

Monroe, La.—George R. Vallery has acquired another pet. It's a snake—this time a ground rattler, about a month old. Vallery is hoping it will soon grow to mature snakehood.

Fish Help Farmer to Judge Weather

Napa, Calif.—It is a simple matter for every farmer to become equipped with an accurate rain forecaster, according to Theodore Arighi, rancher.

When the goldfish in Arighi's fish pond swim at the surface of the water, he knows it is going to rain within a few hours. He contends that this system of weather observation has rarely failed.

PART OF THE PRICE WE PAY

How much is lost because of fraud, misrepresentation and deceit? It is said that the cost of dishonesty in the United States is about two billions of dollars annually, Abuses of credit, fraudulent bankruptcies deceitful sales of undesirable stocks, crooked speculations, gambling, swindling, disguised as merchandising, crimes to obtain insurance money breaches of trust, mismanagement, graft in different forms, corruption, extortion and cheating, principally are responsible for the grievous loss that legitimate business must bear. Loot obtained by actual pickpockets and burglars is small in comparison with what is taken from the public by deception and trickery.

EASTER

The Faith That Life Is Stronger Than Death

IN A spirit of solemn festival Easter is celebrated, commemorating to all Christians the miracle and mystery of Christ's resurrection. Its season in the Northern hemisphere is the springtime of nature's rebirth, a perennial drama of life arising anew from the death and darkness of winter. The story of Scripture and the visible wonder of the earth's transfiguration tell alike of the triumph of life over death, of hope's victory over despair, of the dawn that ends the night of doubt and waiting.

Easter is a Christian festival, but all nations and peoples from ancient times have acknowledged the symbolic significance of the coming of spring. Easter itself is linked to forgotten ceremonies by which the sun was welcomed and the earth rededicated to beauty and fruitfulness. This was always a mystery; it is still a mystery and a marvel, though man has learned a little knowledge and has made the seasons his servants. The flower that springs from the seed, the glory of green that sweeps the [illegible] time are manifest miracles. They fortify and justify the faith of those who believe that on Easter morning a stone was rolled away from a sepulcher in Palestine and death was found vanquished in the Resurrection.

In the simple words that tell of the earliest Easter, there is evident the wonder of its witnesses and the joy with which they found their hopes come true. For in the dark hours of Gethsemane and Golgotha all seemed lost save an oft-repeated promise of resurrection, and hope alone was left to warm the heart of faith and give it courage. But the promise was kept and hope was justified, and the miracle of Easter morning became the cornerstone of Christian faith and doctrine.

In a more ancient story, written when no legend lacked a meaning, hope was the last gift of the gods to a world infested with evils and sorrows. And hope might have died and left the world desolate were it not for the promises made and kept with every cycle of the seasons. These have nourished in all ages the faith which is "the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen." They have taught men to work and wait and trust in the future, to keep courage through darkness and doubt, to seek for new life and happiness, even in the presence of suffering and death.

It has been said that the times have taught us again the value of faith and the need for it. If this is so, then this year's Easter will be widely observed in serious and thoughtful spirit. For these are times of doubt and discouragement and hope itself is weary of waiting for light and leading.

The modern man is perplexed with many problems, but those that touch him closest are old as humanity itself. He seeks life's purpose and its destiny. He is aware of his own bewilderment and troubled by the sardonic certainty of death. Life makes him many promises and asks much of his energy and ambition, but grants no guarantees of peace or prosperity or happiness. And he wonders whether this is all a sorry jest, a pointless prank of fate, an incident of the restlessness of life upon a little planet, spinning aimlessly from nowhere into nothingness.

* * *

The Christian finds a sufficient answer in the significance of Easter morning. The foundation of his faith is the promise of resurrection and its supreme fulfillment in the risen Christ. But the question is older than Christianity and its answer as old as the everlasting hills and the seasons which visit them. Life is stronger than death and is forever renewed in joy and loveliness. Darkness promises the dawn, winter gives way to spring and summer. The past may be forgotten; the future is worth waiting and working for.

For every flower of spring declares that nature is no pessimist and has kept her promises since the world began. And man, who is by birth a child of nature, may learn from this living lesson to deny his own doubts and keep his courage for the work before him.

At Easter Time

by Katherine Edelman

HOW joyful the music of Easter is falling,
What promise and hope lie in every glad strain,
In garden and woodland the songbirds are calling,
Spring with its sunshine has come back again.
All of the gloom and the darkness of winter,
All of its doubting, its chill, and its fear,
Has vanished, and now over meadow and mountain
Vistas of wonder and beauty appear.

Exquisite blueness is tinting the skies,
All of the joy and the wonder of living
Brushes the wings of each creature that flies.
All things unite to make Easter more lovely,
To tell us that winter and sadness are fled;
All things unite to pay homage and glory
To One who in triumph has come from the dead.

How joyful the music of Easter is falling,
All things of nature in unison sing,
Death has been conquered, the long night is ended,
Over the meadows the glad tidings ring.
And just as the darkness of winter is conquered,
So, too, the One that death held in thrall,
Has broken the fetters and come forth in glory,
Bringing new promise and hope to us all.

To Bring an Easter Smile

In northern Europe, many peasants still greet one another with the cry, "Christ is risen." The answer comes, "He is risen, indeed." Then colored Easter eggs are exchanged. Sometimes jokes are told to induce an "Easter smile."

Concerning the Origin and Observance of Lent

THE forty days of Lent are regarded as being kept after the example of Moses (Exodus 24:28) and Elijah (I Kings, 19:8), and above all, as commemorating the fasting of Christ (Matthew, 4:2).

The forty-day fast dates to the early Fourth century. Its origin is obscure. In the early church the duration either was not fixed or it varied in the churches in different countries. But from the Fourth century the period of fasting seems to have approximated more or less closely in most places to forty days, the fast being extended over six or seven weeks, according as Sundays only or Saturdays and Sundays were excepted.

According to the Catholic Encyclopedia, St. Leo (who died in 461) exhorts his hearers to abstain that they may "fulfill with their fasts the apostolic institution of the forty days." But the encyclopedia adds that modern scholars are almost unanimous in rejecting this view, because the existing remains of the first three centuries show "considerable diversity of practice regarding the fast before Easter and also a gradual process of development in the matter of its duration."

"The passage of primary importance," it resumes, "is one quoted by Eusebius from a letter of St. Irenaeus to Pope Victor in connection with the Easter controversy. Irenaeus says there is not only a controversy about the time of keeping Easter, but also regarding the preliminary fast. 'For,' he continues, 'some think they ought to fast for one day, others for two days, and others for several, while others reckon forty hours both of day and night to their fast.'

"He also urges that this variety of usage is of ancient date, which implies that there could have been no apostolic tradition on the subject . . . We may then fairly conclude that Irenaeus about the year 190 knew nothing of any Easter fast of forty days. The same inference must be drawn from the language of Tertullian only a few years later. . . . And there is the same silence observable in all the pre-Nicene fathers, though many had occasion to mention such an apostolic institution if it had existed."

Pope Nicholas, who served from 858 to 867, declared that abstinence on Friday was obligatory on all communicants of the Roman church. Friday corresponds to the day of the week on which Jesus was crucified, and many of the early Christians were already observing it as a weekly fast day; that is, a day on which they abstained from eating flesh meats. Fish being the principal nonflesh meat, it accordingly became the favorite food for those days when flesh meats were forbidden. Also, the fish was one of the earliest symbols of Christianity.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The Law and the Prophets

"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them; for this is the law and the prophets."

Easter, the Birth of Sunday

EASTER, by the derivation of its name, is intimately connected with the East, the sun-rising, day-dawning point! It symbolizes for us the beginning of a new era, with death no longer a blank door closing upon human existence, opening upon only uncertainty or fear beyond; with sin no longer interposing a dense veil between mankind and an offended Creator.

Instead, it tells of life as the Spring-time of a glorious summer, illumined by the beauty of a gracious Father reconciled to mankind—of death as but the entrance to a fuller life in another sphere.

A new life-blessing Sun issued from the garden tomb on Easter morning, and ever since that day of the opened grave we have called the same first day of the week Sunday and made it a happy and should-be holy rest day as a weekly memorial of the most beneficent and most revolutionary event this earth has ever witnessed since upon it light was first made to shine.

JESUS TRANSFIGURED

LESSON TEXT—Mark 9:2-29.

GOLDEN TEXT—And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth. John 1:14.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus God's Son.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Glory of Jesus.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Meaning of the Transfiguration.

In II Peter 1:16-18 is given an inspired interpretation of the transfiguration by one who was present and knew all that transpired. When Christ announced his death which was to take place on the cross, the disciples were greatly perplexed as to how victory could issue from death. Peter, James, and John accompanied Jesus into the mountain. They went there to pray (Luke 9:28).

In order to revive their drooping spirits and restore their confidence he was transfigured before them. Two men were sent from the realms above to talk with Jesus about his approaching death at Jerusalem (Luke 9:31)—the very thing about which the disciples had refused to talk (Mark 8:31-33). The transfiguration is, therefore, a foregleam of the coming Kingdom. It gives the outline of the order and method of the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom.

He took the disciples "by themselves" and was "transfigured before them." This shows that the purpose of the transfiguration terminated upon the disciples and not upon Christ. Christ's rebuke to Peter for his unwillingness to hear concerning his death seemed for a time to estrange the disciples from him. His shining raiment was typical of that glory which shall be manifest when Christ comes back to earth. His appearance on the mountain typifies his visible appearance on the Mount of Olives (Zech. 14:4, 9).

II. Peter, James, and John Represent Israel in the Flesh in Connection With the Kingdom (v. 2).

Christ is peculiarly the King of Israel. According to Ezekiel 37:21-27, the Israelites are to be the central people in Messiah's Kingdom.

III. Moses and Elijah Appeared in Glory With Jesus (vv. 4-13).

These men in the glorified state are typical of the state of the saints in glory. Moses who was once denied an entrance into Palestine now appears in glory. He represented the redeemed of the Lord who shall pass through death into the Kingdom. Elijah represents the redeemed who shall pass into the Kingdom through translation. Some shall be living upon the earth when the Lord comes, who without dying shall be changed and thus pass into the Kingdom (I Cor. 15:50, 53; I Thess. 4:14-18).

1. Peter's proposal (vv. 5, 6). So definitely was the method of the Kingdom unfolded before Peter that he proposed to erect tabernacles, one for Christ, one for Moses, and one for Elijah. It is true that the unveiling of the majestic person of Christ somewhat disconcerted Peter, yet he grasped its central meaning and proposed to celebrate the advent of his Kingdom which had been prefigured in this tangible way.

2. The divine voice out of the cloud (vv. 7, 8). God declared Jesus to be his beloved Son in whom he was well pleased. The way to know what is pleasing to God is to study Jesus.

3. Christ's charge (vv. 9-13). He charged them that they should tell no man concerning the things which they had seen until he had risen from the dead.

IV. The Purpose of the Establishment of the Kingdom Demonstrated (vv. 14-29).

When they descended from the Mount of Transfiguration they witnessed a great multitude in a state of perplexity. The immediate cause of this state was the grievous condition of a young man possessed with a demon (v. 18), whose father had appealed to the disciples to cast out the demon, but they were unable to do so. When they brought him unto Jesus, the foul spirit was rebuked and came forth. This young man's state is representative of the nations who are grievously oppressed by the devil. Just as this young man was grievously oppressed, causing him to cast him self into the fire and into the waters, so the nations even today in their great perplexity are doing the things which will result in their own destruction. The devil will be peculiarly active in the oppression of men and nations in the last days.

Confess Christ

There cannot be a secret Christian. Grace is like ointment hid in the hand; it betrayeth itself. If you truly feel the sweetness of the cross of Christ, you will be constrained to confess Christ before men.—Robert McCheyne.

Time Chief Factor in Cooking Pork

Meat Absolutely Must Be Well Done, and Then It Is Delicious.

Pork is a term which actually covers all the meat which comes from the pig. We usually, however, think of it as the uncured and unsalted products of this animal. Bacon and ham are usually thought of as a different sort of meat, although a century or two ago the term "bacon" was used to cover all pork products. I have often heard persons say "we never eat pork in our household." Perhaps at that very moment we would be eating bacon at breakfast.

Of course, the term "ham" was originally applied to the hind portion of the pig, but it has come to mean either the ham or the shoulder, sometimes known as "picnic" ham after it is cured. "Fresh ham," on the contrary, actually refers to this cut.

Fresh pork is a delicious meat when properly cooked. It should always be thoroughly cooked, and even the thin cuts such as chops and steak need a comparatively long cooking. You may choose your beef or your lamb well done or rare, but pork must be well done. It will be perfectly wholesome as well as delicious under this treatment. Pork digests more slowly than other meats because of the streaks of fat which are found between the fibers, and for this reason it is excluded from the diet of little children and of persons who have digestive disturbance. Bacon, however, is usually ly to be found on the diet list of children and invalids.

In some household the spare ribs are considered one of the choicest delicacies among meats. There is nothing more appetizing than this cut, which takes, however, a good deal of effort in getting the dainty crisp morsels from the bone. Fingers rather than forks are in order when eating spare ribs in epicurean fashion.

Pork Tenderloin, Mushroom Stuffing.

Have two large tenderloins of pork split lengthwise so that they may be flattened out. Dredge in flour, salt and pepper. Cut fresh mushrooms in thin slices. Saute in butter and spread over one tenderloin, lay the other one on top and sew all around the edges. Brown on both sides, then add two tablespoons water, cover and cook slowly for at least one hour. Serve with a thin cream gravy.

Baked Pork Chops.

6 pork shoulder chops
2 onions, chopped
½ teaspoon sage
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
3 tablespoons chopped green pepper
⅛ teaspoon curry powder
¾ cup fine bread crumbs
2 cups tomato puree
Fat drippings

Roll chops in a mixture of the bread crumbs, salt, pepper, sage and curry powder. Saute them in hot drippings until brown. Place the chops in a casserole with the onion and green pepper chopped. Add the tomato puree, cover and cook in a slow oven, 300 degrees Fahrenheit, for two hours.

Quick Meal.

Broiled Ham
Baked Sweet Potatoes
Asparagus With Brown Butter
Cabbage and Pepper Salad
Grapefruit
Coffee

For the quick meal tonight I am suggesting that combination of broiled ham and baked sweet potatoes, which is such a good one. As you have discovered, sweet potatoes take a shorter time to bake than white potatoes—from 25 to 30 minutes only. If you light the oven as soon as you get home from the office it will be ready in about ten minutes. I like a very hot oven for sweet potatoes for the first fifteen minutes and than I lower the heat to moderate. Be sure to press the potatoes all over with a towel when you take them from the oven and to break them open at once. Cover with a towel if you are not ready to serve them. A thin slice of ham will broil or pan-broil in about ten minutes. Asparagus with brown butter or lemon butter combines well with this meal.

Grapefruit is so delicious just now that it is a good choice for dessert, served plain or with a little sweetened claret flavoring.

Order of Preparation.

Light oven
Scrub potatoes and bake
Open asparagus
Prepare salad
Prepare grapefruit
Cook ham
Make coffee
Dress asparagus

FARM POULTRY

TO CHECK INROADS OF POULTRY LOUSE

Eradication Simple Matter, Specialist Says.

By R. E. GRAY, Extension Poultryman. Ohio State University.—WNU Service.

Controlling the inroads of the poultry louse upon the production of the farm flock is a relatively simple task. The first symptoms of lice infestation are droopiness, lowered wings, and ruffled feathers. In young chicks, diarrhea follows and chickens often die in a few days; or in older chicks they sometimes fall prey to various other diseases.

Mature birds sometimes are very heavily infested without showing much ill effects, but usually the egg yield is likely to decrease with a heavy lice infestation. In other cases, the mature bird may lose weight and die as a result of these little rapacious warriors.

Several different types of treatment have been designed for the control of lice; any one of which may be very effective. The big factor to be considered is the ease of treating the birds and the effect upon egg production.

Perhaps one of the best ways of controlling lice is by the use of nicotine sulphate. This material is applied to the top part of the perches just before the birds go to roost. The essential thing is to get as small a quantity as possible along the roosts and yet have some along the entire length of the roost. Although nicotine sulphate is very expensive, it has been found that a teacupful of the material is enough to treat the perches in a house with a capacity of 250 birds.

A second application should be made some eight or ten days after the first in order to destroy the newly-hatched lice.

Give Chicks Plenty of Room in Brooder House

"To successfully brood baby chicks a suitable brooder house and brooding equipment are necessary," says O. C. Ufford, extension poultryman for the Colorado Agricultural college.

"First of all, the brooder house should be large enough to comfortably accommodate without crowding the number of chicks to be brooded. A safe rule is to allow not over three chicks for each square foot of floor space.

"Experiments have shown a direct relationship between death loss of chicks and the amount of brooder floor space allowed per chick.

"The brooder house should be constructed to conserve heat, but it should be arranged so there can be frequent changes in the supply of air.

"Sunlight is important for the normal growth of baby chicks. Sunshine is one of the best disinfectants. The brooder house should be so constructed that it will provide plenty of sunshine. Last, but not least, the brooder house should be made so it can be cleaned easily—so that every crack and crevice may be reached by disinfectants."

How to Make Cold, Damp Poultry House Warm, Dry

Recently it has been found that at very little cost except for labor half-monitor poultry houses can be transformed from cold and damp houses into warm and very satisfactory ones. First the windows at the top are entirely removed, and the south side of the roof is raised at the middle to meet the north roof, so as to make a two-slope gable roof. The whole side can be raised as a unit by loosening the rafters at the middle of the building and then several men lifting it up and splicing the rafters.

When the roof is completed, the windows which were at the top are put into the south wall so as to make it nearly all glass, stringers are put across about six feet above the floor, strips and a 12 to 18-inch layer of oats straw put on, and then slatted openings made in each gable end or ventilators put on the roof.—Prairie Farmer.

Sex Shown by Feathers

At six weeks of age it is difficult, especially with the larger breeds, to tell sex. There are several "tests" offered among them this one: Pluck a few feathers from around the saddle or the base of the tail and hold them up to the light. If they are pointed they indicate a cockerel; if rounded, a pullet, it is claimed. Another way is to hold up the bird by the back of its neck with two finger. If a male it will drop its legs; if a female it will draw them up close to the body.

Use of the Nest Egg

Nest eggs are not of any great value. The hens do not lay any better where they are used. Hens that are kept in a modern poultry house where there are sufficient nests and where the birds are fed and cared for properly do not need any nest eggs. Getting eggs is a matter of feed, and if there are plenty of nests, the hens will have no difficulty in finding them when they are in a laying mood, according to a poultry authority in the Montreal Herald.

Bringing Out the Color in Glass

Venetians Have Shown Us How to Display to Advantage.

In these days, when glassware is so much in evidence, it is interesting to note some of the ways in which in Europe, particularly in Italy, the glass is decoratively displayed. From Venice came the marvelous Venetian glass of earlier periods, and this city retains its choice glassware, intricate in design and delicate of workmanship. A few notes from their ways of making glassware show to best advantage can scarcely fail to prove of practical value to home decorators in this country, whether the glass is of the more usual kinds or numbers among its pieces some of the fragile Italian examples.

Artistic Color Scheme.

Color is emphasized not alone in the glass but in the right selection of colored fruits and even vegetables used in combination with dishes. For example a Venetian glass dish of rich amethyst tone is best displayed with green and yellow contents. So fresh green peppers with their glossy skins are chosen for the green, with a few lemons for yellow, and perhaps some green grapes for paler color between the two hues already selected. Such an artistic color scheme lends beauty to the fine glassware.

Fruit to Enhance Glass.

Or again, a dish of amber glass will have both red and green peppers with a few oranges and their leaves to give a riot of autumn tints to charm the eye. While few of us can have the foliage of orange trees, we can substitute other green leaves, preferably of glossy surface. Red glass of ruby hue requires rich tapestry colors to enhance its richness, so purple and green plums, pears of russet tints and grapes, so dark that they are almost black, are a good selection.

In this faraway land we can use the same discrimination in the use of fruits and vegetables with our colored glass so that the ensemble adds ornament to our dining rooms or dining table centerpieces.

Added Sparkle.

One more suggestion may be offered. When the glassware is in the form of bottles or other liquid containers, of flawless make, the Venetians fill them with pure water, since this increases the sparkle and the beauty of light seen through colored glass. Our glass of this kind should be so placed that rays of light shine through it. In museums choice glassware is so placed, usually in cases before windows. The homemaker can utilize the window sill of a window above a sideboard for the display of her water-filled bottles, or she can place them on a table in front of a window.

J. A. BROWN

Business Established in 1906

There are few business men anywhere who serve the public with such entire satisfaction and with as little criticism as Mr. J. A. Brown. In what ever line he is engaged, the public patronizes it with a firm belief and proven knowledge that it will be done right. He has alwayss kept up with the progressive spirit of this community which has been his home for many years. He was Mayor of Montevallo for two years and is now serving as councilman. Mr. Brown is one of Montevallo's leading citizens and takes an active part in all the affairs for the betterment of the community and is prominently connected with the civic, religious and social affairs of Montevallo.

So the quality of goods he sells and the dependability of the service must be in keeping with the confidence that the public has placed in him. He also gives employment to many deserving local workers.

Brown's Gin.

When a larger and better cotton gin was needed, Mr. Brown first closely investigated everything in that line. He then selected the best, regardless of cost, built and equipped one of the best cotton gins to be found anywhere, which is patronized by satisfied cotton planters for many miles around.

Montevallo Ice Company

Another one of Montevallo's most valuable assets, one that is playing no small part in the economic lives of the people of this section is the Montevallo Ice Company. Mr. Brown has been in the ice business here for 22 years and he maintains the same efficient service. He has the reputation for giving full weight and making prompt delivery, he will go out of his way to do a favor and is always glad to accommodate anyone when extra service is needed. He has been supplying ice for practcally every home and business in town for many years with little or no criticism of his service. The business has steadily grown and although it has been necessary to make enlargement, the capacity of the plant is taxed to the limit.

Their ice is made from distilled water, which has given satisfaction for 22 years.

Cotton Buyer

Mr. Brown has been one of the leading cotton buyers of the State for a number of years. It is the large volume of business that enables him to pay higher prices for cotton.

Montevallo Grocery Co.

Everybody knows the real bargains to be found at Montevallo Grocery Company. They keep one of the largest assortments of Groceries and Feeds of any merchant in town. Not only one of the largest variety but one of the best and freshest to be found. The prices are marked down to the very smallest margin of profit. The large volume of business done by this store enables it to sell such quality merchandise at a low price.

Montevallo Cafe

One of the most satisfactory places in Montevallo to get a quick lunch or regular dinner is at the Montevallo Cafe conducted by Mrs. Walker.

Mrs. Walker has had long experience in this line and knows just how to fix everything good. She personally conducts every service at this popular place, and her home made pies and other good things to eat can not be beat. If you want to find real honest-to-goodness home cooking, eat at this place and you will want to tell everybody how much you enjoy it.

"Robbing Peter to Pay Paul"

"Fable has it," according to Brewer's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, "that this phrase alludes to the fact that on December 17, 1550, the Abbey church of St. Peter, Westminster, was advanced to the dignity of a cathedral by letters patent; but ten years later it was joined to the diocese of London again, and many of its estates appropriated to the repairs of St. Paul's cathedral." The expression may have been a familiar one much earlier than that.

No passage in the Bible justifies the common belief that all the descendants of Benjamin were left-handed. The tribe of Benjamin was always the smallest of the tribes of Israel and left-handedness seems to have been more common among them than among other people. Judges 20:15, 16 says: "And the children of Benjamin were numbered at that time out of the cities twenty and six thousand men that drew sword, beside the inhabitants of Gibeah, which were numbered seven hundred chosen men. Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed; every one could sling stones at a hair breadth, and not miss." Judges 3:15 says in part: "But when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, the Lord raised them up a deliverer, Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man left-handed." I Chron. 12:2 indicates that they were ambidextrous: "They were armed with bows, and could use both the right hand and the left in hurling stones and shooting arrows out of a bow, even of Saul's brethren of Benjamin."—Pathfinder Magazine.

College Day Romances Prove Most Binding

Granvillle, Ohio.—Romances between boys and girls of Denison university bind couples far more securely than those in the great "outside" world, according to compiled records. Out of 380 campus marriages at the school have come only five divorces. It is an average of one marriage failure to each 76 weddings. The national average is one failure for each five or six marriages.

Just the Scallops

The B. family was enjoying a turkey dinner with all the "trimmings" and, of course, scalloped oysters were included. When they were passed to Kathleen, she was asked whether she would like to have some scalloped oysters. She replied:

"Well, I don't care for the oysters, but I will have some of the scallops."

Gold in Quantity Dug From Hills of Wicklow

Bracelets and necklets of pure gold, and 1,500 years old, which came from Ireland, have been discovered on a farm at Towednack, St. Ives, Cornwall. Such finds are treasure-trove and become the property of the crown, but the finders will receive practically the full value of the gold after it has been examined by experts. The gold was obtained from the Wicklow hills. Gold has been obtained from the same source in large quantities until comparatively modern times. In September, 1795, the Wicklow nugget was found. It weighed 22 ounces, and was made into a snuff box for George III. One of the richest finds of Irish gold was the great Clare find of 1854. Four laborers were working on a new cutting for the Limerick & Ennis railway when one of them turned over a pile of gold. One man was so excited that he dropped his spade, filled his hat with gold and dashed off to Newmarket—the nearest town—and sold his find for $150. This hatful was worth $2,000.

Selenium's Odd Property

Metallic selenium is a nonconductor of electricity when in the dark, but on exposure to light it becomes a conductor. This remarkable property has led to the selenium cell, the basic principle of which depends upon coating with a thin film of selenium a conducting metal, such as copper. When a selenium cell is connected in the circuit of a motor or in the firing circuit of a cannon it acts as an open switch as long as it remains in the dark. When light falls upon it, it becomes a conductor and permits current to flow to the motor.

Roosevelt Plan on Farm Loans Calls for Two Billion Bond Issue—30-Hour Week Proposed for Workers—The Akron Disaster.

FOLLOWING the reading of a brief special message on the subject from the President, Senator Robinson of Arkansas introduced the administration's farm mortgage refinancing bill which, with the farm relief bill, is designed to lift the farmers out of the slough of depression.

Senator Robinson

The bill provides for issuing by the farm loan banks of bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000, on which the government guarantees the interest payments. The bonds, or the money derived from their sale, are to be used by the farm loan banks for the purpose of taking over the farm mortgages on which the interest rates cannot be more than 4½ per cent.

The expectation is that with money available to settle with his creditor the farmer can scale down the principal of his debt to a considerable extent. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., governor of the new farm credit administration, believes mortgage indebtedness may be scaled down in two ways. A mortgagee, willing to settle for cash or bonds at 70 or 80 per cent of the principal, could exchange the mortgage on that basis for land bank bonds. The bank then would refinance the farmer at 4½ per cent. Or a farmer making a composition with his creditor could borrow the funds for settlement from the land bank.

Opposition to the legislation revolves around two arguments. One is that it will be an inducement to farmers to default in the payments on their present mortgages in order to persuade mortgagees to settle at less than face value. The other is that such a vast flotation of 4 per cent bonds would tend to demoralize the bond market and react unfavorably on banks and insurance companies with large bond portfolios. The maturity of the bonds is to be fixed by the land banks and probably will be 30 or 40 years.

Stated briefly, the main provisions of the farm finance bill are as follows:

Federal land banks are authorized to issue up to $2,000,000,000 in 4 per cent bonds, interest guaranteed by government.

The same banks could purchase first mortgages on farm land or exchange bonds for them.

The treasury is authorized to subscribe $50,000,000 to the paid-in surplus of the banks.

Interest rate on loans on mortgages shall not exceed 4½ per cent.

A total of $15,000,000 would be available from the treasury to compensate banks for interest reduction.

The limit on mortgage loans would be raised from $25,000 to $50,000.

A total of $100,000,000 of Reconstruction Finance corporation's funds is made available for loans to farmers for refinancing their debts in accordance with provisions of the new bankruptcy relief act.

Reconstruction Finance corporation is authorized to loan $50,000,000 to drainage, levee and irrigation districts to reduce and refinance their debts.

Increases the lending power of the Reconstruction Finance corporation by $300,000,000.

THE number of veterans to be affected by the President's order reducing veterans' benefits will not be known for some time. In one way or another it will be felt by practically all of the Spanish-American and World war veterans, and the widows of veterans of these wars now on the government pension rolls, because it reduces the rates on the greater part of such pensions as will continue to be paid. These reductions and those to be dropped from the pension rolls will be affected after July 1 of this year. In brief, the order makes the following provisions:

Payment of pensions authorized to veterans disabled by disease or injury incurred or aggravated in line of duty in active service.

Rates to be paid for service connected disabilities are: 10 per cent disabled, $8 a month; 25 per cent, $20; 50 per cent, $40; 75 per cent, $60; 100 per cent, $80. These are 20 per cent reductions under present aids.

Pensions authorized to widows, children, and dependent parents of veterans who died from disease or injuries incurred or aggravated in line of duty in active service. Rates continue as at present.

Payments authorized for non-service connected disabilities and deaths of veterans who served 90 days in the Spanish-American war, Boxer rebellion, Philippine insurrection, and World war, provided disability was total and not due to personal misconduct.

Latter allowance will not be made to unmarried persons with income of more than $1,000 a year or to any married person or one with minor children whose income exceeds $2,500.

Pensions of widows and children of Spanish-American war veterans cut 50 per cent.

Excludes peace-time veterans from domiciliary care.

BOTH the senate and house are considering a bill, of which Senator Black, of Alabama is the author, that would establish a thirty-hour work week. As the bill is presumed to have the endorsement of the President and the special approval of Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, it is expected to pass both houses.

The bill would compel private industry to adopt the thirty-hour week and penalize interstate movement of products made by labor working longer hours.

Black expressed confidence the bill would be upheld by the United States Supreme court.

The Alabama senator said the bill would not accomplish its purpose if it resulted in reduction of wage levels as well as hours and expressed the belief that, if industry attempted to reduce wages, congress would act. "Labor has been underpaid and capital overpaid," he said.

Borah said he was "in thorough accord with the principle of this bill and I'm not so sure that we're not going to have to come to it." His argument revolved around whether congress had the power to take action.

THE country's great loss in the destruction of the Akron is not the loss of the navy's great dirigible, but of the 74 officers and men who went down with her in the storm off the coast of New Jersey. Rear Admiral Moffett, chief of the aeronautic bureau of the navy, who was a passenger on board, with his shipmates upheld to the end the finest traditions of the navy.

Admiral Moffett

The wreck of the Akron, largest of its kind in the world, was the worst airship disaster in history. The airship crashed off the New Jersey coast, twenty miles off Barnegat lightship, during a violent electric storm, accompanied by heavy winds and high seas, dense fog and thick rain.

Lieutenant Commander Wiley, second in command of the airship, and the two men who were saved owed their lives to the chance that brought the German oil tanker Phoebus close to the scene of the accident a few minutes after it happened. They were picked up immediately by the Phoebus, whose crew saw others disappear beneath the waves before rescuers could reach them. The Phoebus cruised about the scene until dawn, but was unable to find any more survivors or to keep track of the wreckage, which was carried swiftly away by the seas.

First report of the disaster was received in radio messages from the Phoebus. Both coast guard and naval vessels were immediately dispatched to the scene of the wreck and cruised around for hours in the hope of finding other survivors. The navy blimp J-3, taking part in the search, fell into the sea. Five of its crew were rescued.

The search was fruitless, and, in the case of the accident to the blimp J-3, was ill fated also.

DETERMINATION to end naval airship construction is mounting through a congress intent upon finding the real causes of the Akron's plunge into the Atlantic.

Fred Britten

In the senate King (Dem., Utah), prepared a resolution calling for an investigation of the Akron disaster and the consideration of the advisability of spending more than the $20,000,000 that the navy already has invested in lighter-than-air craft. Chairman Trammel of the senate naval committee also was considering a study of the accident.

Chairman Vinson of the house naval committee has declared emphatically "there won't be any more airships built."

There were some, however, not so ready to yield beliefs founded during many years in congress. Many had followed Representative Britten of Illinois, who as Republican chairman of the naval committee for years had charge of most of the recent legislation for airships, particularly that authorizing the $8,000,000 Akron-Macon sister ship team. Mr. Britten has always declined to support those who thought lighter-than-air craft should be abandoned.

Many members were undecided how far they wanted to go in their ban on airships. Vinson said he thought nothing should be done to prevent operation of the Macon, which is to take the air toward the end of the month. Nor did he think that the new dirigible base at Sunnyville, Calif., where $4,000,000 had been expended, should be shut down.

MICHIGAN is the first state to vote in favor of the repeal of the Eighteenth amendment. Wisconsin is second with a decisive vote of 4 to 1 for repeal. Town and country alike turned out thumping wet majorities. Milwaukee, where the breweries are humming to turn out 3.2 beer, went wet by more than 10 to 1. Wisconsin's constitutional amendment convention will be held in Madison, April 25. It is predicted that practically all the delegates will be committed to repeal. In Michigan, but one county elected a dry delegate.

J. P. MORGAN & CO., New York bankers, are in for an investigation by a committee of the United States senate, and a committee backed by all the authority which that august body can give.

Without debate, the upper chamber adopted the Fletcher resolution extending wide power to the banking committee to make the inquiry into private banking which President Roosevelt has sponsored.

The resolution was drafted by Ferdinand Pecora, committee counsel, with a view to obtaining all the senate's constitutional power over interstate commerce, banking and tax matters for the committee.

Pecora told the committee he had submitted twenty-three questions to the Morgan firm and that on advice of John W. Davis, its counsel, the banking house had refused to answer one and taken several others under consideration.

DESPITE the Hitler government's dropping of the boycott against German Jewry, the National Socialist party will keep its boycott machine intact. Disappointed at being deprived of the boycott, Nazi auxiliary police raided a Jewish quarter in Berlin. Accompanied by regular police, they searched everywhere for weapons and papers. Streets were closed and pedestrians were stopped. Even worshippers leaving synagogues were halted. Persons not carrying double identification cards were arrested.

The Nazi boycott committee headquarters at Munich announced that "all German stores in the near future will be supplied with big placards identifying them as such." In this way the Nazis will distinguish between German and Jewish stores.

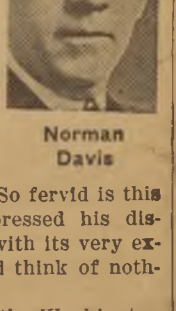
A NEW suggestion for a preliminary conference of experts to be held in the United States to prepare for the world economic conference developed at a meeting in Paris between Norman H. Davis, President Roosevelt's ambassador-at-large, and Joseph Paul-Boncour, French foreign minister. In this the French see their opportunity of talking over war debts.



Norman Davis

Like the British, the French want to wangle a debt settlement before the economic conference convenes. So fervid is this desire that Davis expressed his displeasure that Europe, with its very existence at stake, should think of nothing else.

Mr. Davis feels that the Washington administration has made it clear that there are bigger jobs to be done—removal of trade barriers, for example.

So with hopes of calling the economic conference at an early date abandoned, the idea of a preliminary meeting to agree on what is to be done and how to go about it is making headway.

When the new French ambassador to the United States, Andre Lefevre de la Boulaye, sailed for America he was accompanied by a treasury expert to prepare the ground for what Paris hopes will be a general debts discussion.

Responsible officials of the State department in Washington declared that reports from London that Mr. Davis had presented an offer to scale down Britain's debt to the United States by $692,000,000 were absolutely without foundation.

Premier Ramsay MacDonald plans to sail for the United States about April 15 for a conference with President Roosevelt regarding war debts, world economics and armament.

MOUNT EVEREST at last has been conquered. Two airplanes have flown across the summit and for the first time in history men looked down upon the highest mountain in the world. The feat was accomplished by the British expedition headed by the marquis of Clydesdale. A photographer succeeded in taking a number of pictures which, it is hoped, will provide an authentic record of the conquest of the 29,002-foot mountain, on the sides of which numerous men have perished attempting by old-fashioned methods to gain the honor of being the first to reach the top.

Although exhaustive preparations had been made for the flight over Mount Everest, the actual carrying out of the feat was in a measure accidental. When the two ships went up the purpose of the flyers was only to make a test. But they found conditions so ideal that they turned the test into the real business. The two planes flew at an altitude of approximately 6.6 miles and the flight over the peak required three and a half hours.

FASCISM is growing in Great Britain. Every manifestation of the Fascist movement in Italy and Germany can be seen in and around the house where Sir Oswald Mosley, millionaire would-be dictator, has based the British Union of Fascists. The waiting room is a small gymnasium. Physical training is compulsory. The Mosley black shirts, who are the beginnings of the British storm troops, are required to box, fence or wrestle twice weekly.

The black shirts form the nucleus of Mosley's "army." They have an auxiliary in the gray shirts, who can not give as much time to physical training as the black shirts but who have a big place in the strong arm branch of the organization.

National Topics Interpreted
by William Bruckart

Washington.—It is seldom that in the short space of a few weeks there have been two court decisions of such far-reaching consequence as the so-called coal agency case, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the determination by the United States District Court for Virginia that the federal water power act is constitutional.

Two Important Decisions

In each instance, the court finding appears on its surface just to be a mine-run opinion. But it happens, however, that each of the opinions directly affects you and me. Besides that result, the coal agency decision is of vital importance to business.

With respect to the coal agency case, the facts are that a group of coal mine operators banded together in the Appalachian Coals, Inc., for the purpose of distributing their output. It is a sales agency, purely. Its purpose is to reduce the cost of marketing the product. Also, it appears likely that formation of such a selling organization may have the effect of controlling production to some extent at least, although that phase of the business did not show up in the organization program.

It would appear on the surface that such an arrangement would be in violation of the anti-trust laws, but the Supreme court found otherwise. By the stamp of approval which the highest court in the land gave to the organization, it can be classified almost, if not quite, as of the same type as a farmers' co-operative.

But the ruling gives rise to broader significance. Other industries based on natural resources of the country are expected to follow in the same pathway in order to accomplish reduced selling costs. Lumber, gas, oil, iron, steel, copper and fertilizer interests are said to be looking longingly at the plan as one which will enable them to operate with some assurance of a return on huge investments. The Supreme court considered that the plan maintained the necessary elements of competition, and if that construction be proved in practice, then you and I, as a natural result, should receive some direct as well as indirect benefit. I mean we would be benefitted, if we lived in the territory where coal furnished through the selling agency is distributed, by somewhat cheaper prices on the same grades of coal.

From the standpoint of business, the coal operators have worked out the first important program that is acceptable to the courts when viewed under magnifying glass of the anti-trust laws and at the same time permits of that co-operation which agriculture so long has contended was vital to it. Other industries probably will follow the lead. If they do not abuse the privileges, we have entered upon a new era in industry. If there are abuses, then industry will have killed the goose that laid the golden egg.

The decision by the United States District court at Norfolk, Va., which held the federal water power act to be constitutional opens the way to complete federal regulation of utilities. We will hear for some years to come that the "New River case" affords the basis for many pieces of legislation of direct benefit to the users of electricity for power and light. Of course, it is yet to be decided by the Supreme Court of the United States where the litigation will be carried without doubt, but the majority of constitutional lawyers entertain no doubt as to its validity.

To the electric user, therefore, the decision stands of broadest importance. By holding the law constitutional, the court removed a serious obstacle to effective government control over many of the tricks to which great corporations devote themselves to establish a cost basis for their product which warrants the highest possible rates. I make no comment as to the legality or illegality of these practices. It remains as a fact, however, that every industry subject to regulatory powers of government, whether national or state, seeks to protect its investments by creating for its product a book basis of high cost. This is done obviously in order to meet the ever-continuing demand from utility commissions for rate reductions.

There is another angle to the "New River case." Superficially, it appears likely to be of some value to investors in stock companies engaged in development of water power for electricity. It works out in this way: The corporation which has established a high cost basis for its electricity quite naturally issues its stock on that basis. Consequently, it is seeking a return on an investment that, in too many instances, is not justified by the facts. In other words, it results in watered stock. Having watered the stock beyond sound judgment, the corporation fights every move that appears if the result is a lowered schedule of electric rates. Hence, it is fighting directly at the users of electricity whether for lighting purposes in a small home or for power purposes in a gigantic factory.

Interests Investors

Of course, this decision applies only to hydro-electric plants. It does not affect the plants producing electricity by steam. There are those, however, who say the decision will have a bearing on those rates, too, for the reason that unless the steam plants maintain reasonable rates, water-powered plants will find openings to enter that field if water is available anywhere near.

This latter possibility is cited because it shows better than anything else how far-reaching a dry old court opinion may turn out to be. The opinion in each of the cases mentioned was written in the usual style, but each one may be looked upon, ten years from now, as a landmark.

* * *

It is actually ridiculous how every part and parcel of a national program develops a camp following of new ideas for expansion of that plan. Most of them are just like a parasite. They are put forward by some one with an ax to grind. They see a peg upon which they can hang their pet hope and proceed to spread all kinds of argument in support of that hope or idea.

Unemployment Program

Such is the case with President Roosevelt's unemployment program. He, as everyone else, obviously wants to provide work for men who must have food and are willing to work to obtain it. Washington has seen a dozen proposals offered to expand the unemployment program. Most of them are actually silly in the view of observers here, but the proponents of the several additions to the relief policy seem to take them seriously whether they deserve that consideration or not.

The latest proposal—and it has become a demand of some proportions—is to go ahead with expansion of the United States navy as an unemployment relief measure. That I may not be misunderstood, permit me to say that I favor a much larger navy than we now have. It is necessary, as I conceive the situation, that the "first line of defense" be made into a powerful unit. There are plenty of authorities in Washington who are not too optimistic concerning world relationships. Construction of the navy to the limit allowed by the London naval treaty, therefore, appears to many as being justified and necessary.

But the point sought to be made, however, is that a program for development of the navy should stand on its own merits. It has no place in the unemployment relief program and adoption of it as such, according to the best judgment I can obtain, would cheapen the ideal of a great defensive organization and make it susceptible later to unjustified attacks from opponents of a big navy for the nation. In other words, demands for naval expansion as a part of the program for putting men to work makes it hard to decide the question of naval defense on its true base, namely, the question of whether a need for it exists, and results in confusion of the issues of relief and naval expansion.

Washington observers, and some of the "faithful" Democrats, as well, have been having a quiet laugh at the discomfiture of patronage-seeking members of the senate and house who have been held in line by the fast political thinking of President Roosevelt. The President, having said he would do little about major patronage—the real plums—until he had been able to solve some of the great financial and economic problems, was in a fine position to swing the political lash on any member of the legislative branch who showed signs of stubbornness. And, it may be added, he has done so.

Patronage as a Club

While maneuvers of this sort obviously are not made the subject of public pronouncements, certain facts have developed showing that on several occasions ambitious senators or representatives have deemed it decidedly advisable to stand hitched to the President's programs. They may or may not have liked his proposals, but they went along with him just like good little boys. They heard the master's voice in a way that made them decide quickly what they should do.

Of course, some of the major appointments have had to be made. Cabinet selections are what are known as personal selections by the President. Such is not the case, however, with what is known as the "Little Cabinet," that long list of undersecretaries, assistant secretaries, and the like. These jobs are used ordinarily to help some of the individuals nail solid planks on their political fences in the home community. Such appointments might help in another election, you know, and consequently they are much sought after by the faithful.

There have been some of the "Little Cabinet" posts filled, and there are others for which the appointments are near. But the President and Jim Farley, who runs the Democratic party from his job as postmaster general, have not overlooked any bets. It is my conclusion that they obtained what they wanted in the way of support before the selections were definitely concluded.

SYNOPSIS

"Tom" Belknap, big timber operator, ordered by his physicians to take a complete rest, plans a three months' trip abroad. Promises of advancement he has made to his son John are broken, and the young man is indignant. Paul Gorbel, Belknap's partner, whom John cordially dislikes, is a bone of contention. Father and son part without a complete understanding. At Shoestring, his train delayed by a wreck, John is ordered to leave at once. He refuses.

Voices, then sharp and profane. Someone struck him on the cheek, and with an uppercut John dropped a man who charged in from the right. The taste of blood on his lips goaded him.

They came on with a rush. He kicked one's feet from under him, and the falling fellow tripped another. He struck and kicked and elbowed and ducked. His head rocked sideways from a blow, and he squeezed his eyes shut for a split instant to check the mounting dizziness. They could have had him down and beaten to a pulp in one minute, if they'd used their heads. They were too mad, too eager to carry the fight; they got in one another's way, fended off the blows of their fellows.

A man, charging him, checked and veered, and he had a fleeting glimpse of a small figure on the edge of the group, shoving at his assailants, holding up a dissuading hand.

"Stop! Stop it! Tiny, Ezra, Way-Bill! Let him alone!"

The "him" was beyond a doubt John Steele Belknap, but that young man was now in no mood to be let alone! The figure of the leader was before him, poised, waiting; perhaps in indecision at the sudden wilting of spirit or intent among his fellows; perhaps waiting on this stranger who was so unwelcome in their midst. If for the latter his wait was brief because as he kicked free from those impending hands John rushed him, striking out quickly with short, savage blows, glorying in this moment of even odds.

The man retreated slowly. Once he landed and jolted John severely, but this advantage worked against him because it tapped buried reservoirs of strength and fury and hard fists bore him backward into the glare that streamed from the open station doorway.

A cry, then, as John, bareheaded, face set, burst into the light.

"'Tain't him, Tiny! 'Tain't him!"

Now this Tiny might, in another instant, have had reason to claim that the shout distracted him, did he care to lay upon an alibi. But even before the words were past the lips that yelped them, John found the opening he had been fighting for.

Full on the point of Tiny's chin his knuckles struck and the man's legs sagged. The force of the blow rocked him backward and he crumpled. His head, lolling to one side, crunched oddly as it struck the wheel of a baggage truck.

John heard that sound and a tingle ran through him. He lurched on forward, crouching as if to pounce upon his fallen adversary. Well enough to knock the big devil out, but he did not like that crunch! Hands clutched at his shoulder and a hoarse protest was in his ear.

"Get away!" John cried, shaking off the hands, heedless of the words, and dropped to his knees in the snow beside the fallen man.

"Hit his head!" someone cried, as they gathered closely about, a weir of legs damming back light from the doorway.

"Get back!" John snapped. "Out of the light, you!"

The voice of authority, that, and it cut through a rising mutter from the crowd, forced a falling back to let yellow light filter on the prostrate Tiny.

The man's face was bruised and bleeding. He lay lax, and when John raised one of the great arms it dropped back limply. The man breathed heavily, and apprehension mounted in the boy's consciousness.

"Get hold here!"—sharply. "Carry him inside where I can see!" And gently, easily, considering the man's weight, he slid an arm beneath the broad shoulders and raised the torso.

Others helped, for the most part wordlessly, and they shuffled into the waiting room with their burden, placing it carefully on the floor beside the stove.

John was heedless of the crowd that pressed close again. He removed the thick cap from Tiny's head and with light, careful fingers rummaged through the stiff hair. He encountered no great bruise, no depression. The cap had been ample protection; no fracture, perhaps not even . . .

Tiny stirred and moaned.

"Get me some snow!" John said, and two scurried outside.

With his handkerchief he wiped blood from the man's chin, and when the snow came he took a great handful and held it against brow and temples.

Tiny grimaced and puckered his lips and stirred. He moaned next, and opened one eye and whimpered.

"What th' h—l—" he began, and the crowd stirred, as in relief.

John drew a deep breath, then, and looked up at the faces above him; weather-beaten, vigorous faces, they were, and as his eyes swept them they turned on him with curious expressions.

"He wants to know what the h—l," he began. "And that makes two of us. What the h—l does it—"

He broke short. He had settled back to his heels, searching those faces with a demand for explanation, when he saw her. She had stood beside him, looking down. Very small and slight of figure she was, and the face beneath the snug turban of beaver was as gentle as those others were rough. Her eyes were dark and large and serious; more than serious, perhaps; possibly deep trouble rode in them to go with the repressed line of her mouth.

She was looking full in his face, and as he broke his gruff question he inclined his head slightly as in recognition of a difference—and in apology.

He caught his breath. "Sorry!"—to her. "I should say"—whipping his glance to the men again—"what's a stranger to think of being ganged like this?"

A slim, wiry man, who had squatted on the other side of the reviving Tiny, spoke.

"We was expectin' another party, chum," he said. "You're a match for him in size, but you ain't the one we're lookin' for; this particular hard egg sent in to clean us out by old Tom Belknap!"

John's head jerked. He leaned tensely forward!

"I said; we'd got news a certain party who's raised h—l here was comin' in to put a chunk under a corner. We aimed to get him back to Kampfest with bad news for old Belknap. Bein' excited like we was, and bein' dark like it was, we mistook you for him. Not important, mebby, but true!"

"Well, I'll be—"

He looked up again for the girl's face, as though an exchange of glances with her might clarify this bewildering situation. She was gone. He stared at the others, but they were watching Tiny, who was being helped to a sitting posture by the smaller man.

"All right, Tiny?" the other asked.

The big fellow felt his chin gingerly and his head, and then shook it as if to chase off the fog which impaired his faculties.

"'D he git away?" he asked.

A chuckle from the crowd then.

"Away, your grandma! There he sets, Tiny!"

The dazed eyes followed the gesture and then blinked slowly.

"'Y G—d, Way-Bill, 'tain't him," he said weakly.

"No, 'tain't."

"But this one . . . he's a stem-winder!"

"Anyhow, that."

"'Nd if this one was him—"

"Then we'd have a lot more to worry about. Yes, sir, if old Belknap could hire 'em like you, chum"—to John—"then the company would have somethin' to lay awake nights about!"

Tiny had been staring at John and now his gaze wavered as a man's will when he is overcome with embarrassment.

The boy's heart was pounding. Old Tom, starting that sort of trouble?

"All right, Tiny?" Way-Bill asked, and when assured that the late unconscious man was getting to be as good as new, he turned to John. "Guess it's due you to explain a little," he said, and John caught some vague change in the attitude of the group. The shuffling of feet, the murmurs, the looks spoke of a growing chagrin and embarrassment such as had marked Tiny's faltering gaze. "Stranger in this country?"

"Yes."

"Mebby you've heard of old Tom Belknap?"

"I have . . . once"—some of his wrath surging upward to mingle with high curiosity.

"Well, he's evident aimin' to run the Richards company, here, off the earth. He's done a plenty, but the last thing he thought up was to bring a hand named Baxter from Kampfest."

John, frowning, followed the man's matter-of-fact words closely. He spoke as one sure of himself; even as one reciting common knowledge.

"This Baxter's a tough customer. He mixed it with our woods boss last week, tossed him off a car 'nd broke his hip. Tonight he was advertised to come over here 'nd clean out the town single-handed. Makes us pretty hot"—voice rising a trifle—"bein' that old Belknap only wants to close us down so's he can buy somethin' for little or nothin'. We done what, likely, you'd do for the outfit that hired you 'nd you knew was fair 'nd square 'nd in a jack-pot. Only . . . we done 'n error."

A grim little man, he was, but had spoken with a fine spirit of loyalty. He now added: "I'm sorry. Tiny, here, sure ought to be awful sorry, and I guess everybody else feels like we do. I hope, chum, the feelin's ain't too hard."

They stilled as a group will when an answer to an important question is due.

"Why, no. . . . I see how it is," John said, but blankly.

Mistaken for his father's hired bully! And old Tom trying to run this other company into a corner? . . . Old Tom, mixing it as, perhaps, an even older Belknap had done in the pine days? Was that a possible explanation of why he—young John—had been so carefully kept away from Kampfest? Were things transpiring in this country of which his father was ashamed?

Like a white-hot thread the thought seared through his consciousness. If a fight was on here, waged by his father against a weaker competitor. . . . Now, might that not offer a greater vent, a more complete relief for his swelling resentment than bashing strangers with his fists? Until this moment his only possible vengeance on his father had been to run away, but now . . .

A man came in from outside, shouldering through the press, beating snow from a Scotch cap with his mitten.

"Here," he said, holding it toward John. "Here's your cap. I . . . I guess I knocked it off and . . well, you see how it was."

He was flushed and so evidently contrite that John smiled, and when he smiled the tension that had been on those men relaxed. The presentation of that cap was equivalent to a treaty gift, a token to heal a breach, a pledge and seal of friendship!

"Anything we can do for you now . . . after tryin' our best licks to do things to you?" Way-Bill asked.

"Why . . . I guess not. Thanks a lot." He was finding his poise, stilling the hot curiosity that might lead him into blunders, making up his mind to learn this whole story, but to do it adroitly, at the proper time. "If somebody'll point out the hotel, now. . . ."

* * * * * * *

It was past the supper hour in Shoestring's one public stopping place, Rex Jasper's Palace hotel.

But Rex was neither inhospitable nor unmindful of the dimes. No more was he an uncommunicative host. So he himself spread cold but satisfactory viands on one end of a long table and sat there, elbows on the oilcloth, while his slightly marred but obviously outstanding guest ate, and responded well to the questions that John Steele Belknap, identity as yet unknown in Shoestring, put to him.

The boy ate slowly, gazed much of the time on Jasper's face as the man talked and talked and talked.

"It just goes to show," he said, narrowing his watery blue eyes, "what the concentration of great wealth into the hands of unscrupulous men will cause. Now did you ever read the 'History of Great American Fortunes?' "

"No," said John impatiently. "But are you sure that this man Belknap is behind all the trouble?"

"Sure? Sure!" The little man bristled with assurance. "Wasn't it a Vanderbilt that said that the thing a man wanted more than anything else was more? That's the way with this old Belknap. Predatory, he is; of the predatory wealthy! He's got the Richards company in a corner and he ain't goin' to let it out. Why, even his own partner, Gorbel, over here at Kampfest, can't stop him. Gorbel ain't so bad, but Belknap gives the orders. You can't blame Gorbel. If a man's goin' to exist economically under a capitalist system he's got to go with the capitalists, ain't he? Now if you've ever read 'Das Kapital' by Karl Marx you'll see—"

John shoved back his plate and tapped the table with his fork.

"Just a minute. Let's see if I've got this story right: The logging railroad, owned by the Richards Lumber company, goes through Belknap & Gorbel timber. The right of way was granted by a man named Kampfest who used to own that timber. Belknap & Gorbel bought him out and began to operate. Under the terms of the old contract they can either force the Richards company to haul their logs out to a main-line branch or order them to pull their steel. And, to tighten this squeeze, the Belknap camps are making logs in such quantities that the mill here can't be safely logged? That it?"

"That's right! This old Belknap ain't satisfied to have a soft thing, he ain't. The Richards mill's been gettin' by some way; God knows how, 'nd soon's he sees that he starts gettin' rough, just like any old feudal baron'd got rough. He has his hired help put Royce, the Richards woods' boss, out of commission, which is awful bad. You can't log without a good boss, and no man in his right mind's going to tackle a job where, on top of having to scratch to make a showin', he's in danger of getting his block knocked off any minute.

"Why, this old Belknap thinks he's a superman or something. I guess he's been reading Nietzsche. Did you ever read 'Beyond Good and Evil?' No? Well, now"—wriggling closer to the table—"there's what I'd call a downright dangerous philosophy. You see—"

But John Belknap, leaning back in his chair now, gave no heed to Landlord Jasper's interpretation of philosophical theory. After what his father had done to him yesterday, young John was ready to believe anything. He had known of wars waged by old Tom against competitors; he had always thought them waged on fair terms. But here was a conflict apparently unfair, unwarranted. Shoestring, to a man, evidently attested to its ruthlessness, and John's temper drove him headlong into an acceptance of that belief. Headlong and gladly. As good as a blow in the mouth, this! He had been kept away from Kampfest after heading towards it these years.

Why? What reason? Because old Tom did not want him to know what was going on? Because he knew that John would have demanded an about-face?

Well, how would his father like it if he refused to take what was offered; if, more than that, he stepped in and aligned himself with an opposition because it gave him a chance to see what he was wound on? And with their backs to the wall, this Richards outfit, whoever and whatever it might be, needed a leader, fresh blood, someone who was not afraid of this giant, Tom Belknap!

"Where's the Richards office?" John interrupted, rising.

Jasper blinked his watery eyes again.

"Why, it's acrost from the mill," he said, shuffling to a window and peering out through the slit of unfrosted glass near the top of the pane. "Yes; the' 's a light there now. Generally is, nights . . . this winter."

Snow had ceased falling. The wind had dropped and the planks of wooden sidewalks, deep under hard-packed snow, snapped and boomed as John traversed the shadows of lumber piles towards the looming hulk of a sawmill and the lighted, one-story building across from it which had been pointed out to him.

He had no definite plan. He had considered telling the manager the whole truth and asking for a job. That, however, might not be advisable; depended entirely on the type of individual he encountered. It would be a tough chore to convince some men that they should hire for a responsible post the son of an arch enemy! . . . But whoever he found he would at least learn more of what his father was up to. Of that only was he certain as he took the office steps at a jump and opened the door.

The building was divided into halves by a cold hallway. A single incandescent, dusty and weak with service, was set in the ceiling. Its light was not good, but a room to the left had better illumination, and on the glazed glass of the door was painted the word Manager.

John stamped snow from his feet on a husk rug, but as he started for this evidently occupied office, the sound of a voice arrested him.

A man was talking swiftly, quietly, and he stopped, not wanting to intrude at an inopportune time, but impatient at the delay.

The voice went on: ". . . and my offer stands! I'm helpless to help the Richards company in any other way, but I will buy, at that price, the entire property, timber, railroad and mill!

"Perhaps this offer seems small, but look what is going to happen if you try to keep on alone! I'm a partner with Tom Belknap, yes, but I'm powerless to shape the policy or direct the practice of that partnership! I'd give every dollar I have, Ellen, to see you personally at peace, but you will have no peace until Belknap has his way! He is out to buy this company at a figure even lower than I offer, and he finishes what he starts. . . . Now, what do you say?"

John's heart raced as he stood there listening. The man in that other room was Paul Gorbel. He was making threats in Tom Belknap's name! Bullying a woman for old Tom!

The woman spoke then.

"I have only one thing to say, Paul! That the Richards properties aren't for sale at any such absurd price; that they aren't for sale at any figure under such pressure. They're in a tight place, well enough; they would have plenty to contend with in a fair fight, but you may take this word back to your Mr. Belknap: that the Richards company is going to keep on fighting, that it's not going to whimper; that if it finally goes down, after doing all it can do to survive, it will be with the flag flying and the band-saw singing!

"Take that word to your renegade partner, Paul, and don't come here again with one hand extended in friendship and the other carrying a club!"

Her voice, gentle in the beginning, had mounted, and her hard-flung defiance sent a prickling sensation to John's very finger-tips. Some loyal employee—a bookkeeper, an office woman; a wife or daughter or sister of the Richards involved—had set Gorbel down with a jolt!

Behind that closed door, a low, sorry laugh and the sound of slow footsteps. A shadow crossed the lighted glass and Gorbel spoke again.

"Ellen! . . . Ellen, dear! Don't you see that behind this is only one thing for me? Can't you understand that I'm risking all I've got just trying to help you in small ways? It's you I want"—voice roughening a bit with passion. "It's you who's got into my blood! It's the waiting that kills me. . . . I can't wait, I tell you! I can't—"

"Get back! Get away! Don't you dare touch me!"

He called her name again, almost savagely. Feet scraped on the floor; a sharp cry as with a crash the light in the office went out and the glass in the door showed a blank for John Belknap.

"Paul! Get out of this office, I tell you! Get away . . away!"

Panic, now, in the tone, and for the man waiting outside there was but one move to make. . . .

The faint light from the hallway, further impaired by his own shadow as he poised there, hand still on the knob, revealed them.

A desk lamp lay on the floor at the man's feet and he was turning, relinquishing his hold on the girl's wrist, looking over his shoulder with a white, drawn face. He posed so a moment, staring at this intruder who showed only in silhouette.

"Well?"—in sharp demand.

Young Belknap did not move; did not reply for a moment. Then he said almost casually:

"I happened to overhear you being told to get out. I opened the door for you."

Gorbel whirled to face him then, feet spread, arms held with stiff truculence at his sides.

"And who are you?"—bright eyes searching, striving to identify the shadowed face.

"The chap who opened the door."

"Well. . . . Close it, then, and tend to your own affairs!"

John shook his head.

"No," he said. "Not until the . . . the lady asks me to."

He could see her standing in the deeper shadows where she had swiftly retreated on his appearance. She was backed against a filing case as though in need of support. He added, then:

"I don't hear her asking me to get out."

Gorbel's hands were knotting into fists.

"You d—d eavesdropper!" he muttered. "You—"

John took the few quick strides that put him face to face with Gorbel, so close to him that he could hear the man's quick breathing.

"No names!" he muttered. "No names . . . or any other talk. Are, you going out on your own legs?"

Gorbel swayed backward. His right hand swept the desk top, and with a growl John had the arm in one hand, twisted the man about, and wrenched upward on the wrist until Gorbel doubled over with a cry.

"Drop it!"

"The devil with—"

"Drop it, I told you!"

Beauty Sleep

The first dim light filtered in through the filmy curtains and struck full upon her chin strap. It crept upward until it covered the cleansing cream generously smoothed upon her face. Still farther stole this first revealing beam; it touched the skin tonic, the special astringent, the muscle oil, the circulation ointment, and finally reached the eyelash darkener. At this point she stirred and thrust out a bare arm pink to the elbow with liquidine bleaching lotion. She turned uneasily and with a drowsy motion adjusted her wrinkle eradicator, and fell into another doze.—Kansas City Star.

Bible Called King of All Textbooks

Unsurpassed for Descriptive Imagery and Power of Expression.

That professor at the University of Texas who is requiring students in journalism to practice rewriting stories from the Bible is but applying an old idea in a new environment. The English Bible has long been king of textbooks for him who would know how to write the English language. In addition to its instructional value, the course at Texas ought to serve as a chastener of vanity.

All things considered, there never was a better reporter than Luke. He wasted no words; he never spent time on introductions; he had perfect understanding of color, movement, background. His account of a shipwreck (Acts 27:28) has not been surpassed in nineteen centuries. It begins gently as a zephyr:

"And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence they sailed close by Crete. But not long after there arose against it a tempestous wind, called Euroclydon. And when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive."

The wind did not rise more rapidly than the swell of the narrative nor did it subside more delightfully. Young journalists should get much profit out of trying to tell the tale better if only by the discovery that it can not be better told. The Old Testament is full of work of first-rate reporters. It would be interesting to know what the youngsters of Texas would make out of the account of the death of a certain royal termagant who found Nemesis staring her in the eye:

"And when Jehu was come to Jezreel, Jezebel heard of it; and she painted her face, and tired her head, and looked out at a window. And as Jehu entered in at the gate, she said, Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?

"And he lifted up his face to the window, and said, Who is on my side? who? And there looked out to him two or three eunuchs. And he said, Throw her down. So they threw her down: and some of her blood was sprinkled on the wall, and on the horses: and he trode her under foot."

For anybody who wishes to write strong, vivid, incisive English there is no exercise which is more useful than persistent study of the phraseology of the Bible.—New York Sun.

EASTER

The Faith That Life Is Stronger Than Death

IN A spirit of solemn festival Easter is celebrated, commemorating to all Christians the miracle and mystery of Christ's resurrection. Its season in the Northern hemisphere is the springtime of nature's rebirth, a perennial drama of life arising anew from the death and darkness of winter. The story of Scripture and the visible wonder of the earth's transfiguration tell alike of the triumph of life over death, of hope's victory over despair, of the dawn that ends the night of doubt and waiting.

Easter is a Christian festival, but all nations and peoples from ancient times have acknowledged the symbolic significance of the coming of spring. Easter itself is linked to forgotten ceremonies by which the sun was welcomed and the earth rededicated to beauty and fruitfulness. This was always a mystery; it is still a mystery and a marvel, though man has learned a little knowledge and has made the seasons his servants. The flower that springs from the seed, the glory of green that sweeps the hills in springtime are manifest miracles. They fortify and justify the faith of those who believe that on Easter morning a stone was rolled away from a sepulcher in Palestine and death was found vanquished in the Resurrection.

In the simple words that tell of the earliest Easter, there is evident the wonder of its witnesses and the joy with which they found their hopes come true. For in the dark hours of Gethsemane and Golgotha all seemed lost save an oft-repeated promise of resurrection, and hope alone was left to warm the heart of faith and give it courage. But the promise was kept and hope was justified, and the miracle of Easter morning became the cornerstone of Christian faith and doctrine.

In a more ancient story, written when no legend lacked a meaning, hope was the last gift of the gods to a world infested with evils and sorrows. And hope might have died and left the world desolate were it not for the promises made and kept with every cycle of the seasons. These have nourished in all ages the faith which is "the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen." They have taught men to work and wait and trust in the future, to keep courage through darkness and doubt, to seek for new life and happiness, even in the presence of suffering and death.

It has been said that the times have taught us again the value of faith and the need for it. If this is so, then this year's Easter will be widely observed in serious and thoughtful spirit. For these are times of doubt and discouragement and hope itself is weary of waiting for light and leading.

The modern man is perplexed with many problems, but those that touch him closest are old as humanity itself. He seeks life's purpose and its destiny. He is aware of his own bewilderment and troubled by the sardonic certainty of death. Life makes him many promises and asks much of his energy and ambition, but grants no guarantees of peace or prosperity or happiness. And he wonders whether this is all a sorry jest, a pointless prank of fate, an incident of the restlessness of life upon a little planet, spinning aimlessly from nowhere into nothingness.

The Christian finds a sufficient answer in the significance of Easter morning. The foundation of his faith is the promise of resurrection and its supreme fulfillment in the risen Christ. But the question is older than Christianity and its answer as old as the everlasting hills and the seasons which visit them. Life is stronger than death and is forever renewed in joy and loveliness. Darkness promises the dawn, winter gives way to spring and summer. The past may be forgotten; the future is worth waiting and working for.

For every flower of spring declares that nature is no pessimist and has kept her promises since the world began. And man, who is by birth a child of nature, may learn from this living lesson to deny his own doubts and keep his courage for the work before him.

At Easter Time

by Katherine Edelman

HOW joyful the music of Easter is falling,
What promise and hope lie in every glad strain,
In garden and woodland the songbirds are calling,
Spring with its sunshine has come back again.
All of the gloom and the darkness of winter,
All of its doubting, its chill, and its fear,
Has vanished, and now over meadow and mountain
Vistas of wonder and beauty appear.

Exquisite blueness is tinting the skies,
All of the joy and the wonder of living
Brushes the wings of each creature that flies.
All things unite to make Easter more lovely,
To tell us that winter and sadness are fled;
All things unite to pay homage and glory
To One who in triumph has come from the dead.

How joyful the music of Easter is falling,
All things of nature in unison sing,
Death has been conquered, the long night is ended,
Over the meadows the glad tidings ring.
And just as the darkness of winter is conquered,
So, too, the One that death held in thrall,
Has broken the fetters and come forth in glory,
Bringing new promise and hope to us all.

To Bring an Easter Smile

In northern Europe, many peasants still greet one another with the cry, "Christ is risen." The answer comes, "He is risen, indeed." Then colored Easter eggs are exchanged. Sometimes jokes are told to induce an "Easter smile."

Concerning the Origin and Observance of Lent

THE forty days of Lent are regarded as being kept after the example of Moses (Exodus 24:28) and Elijah (I Kings, 19:8), and above all, as commemorating the fasting of Christ (Matthew, 4:2).

The forty-day fast dates to the early Fourth century. Its origin is obscure. In the early church the duration either was not fixed or it varied in the churches in different countries. But from the Fourth century the period of fasting seems to have approximated more or less closely in most places to forty days, the fast being extended over six or seven weeks, according as Sundays only or Saturdays and Sundays were excepted.

According to the Catholic Encyclopedia, St. Leo (who died in 461) exhorts his hearers to abstain that they may "fulfill with their fasts the apostolic institution of the forty days." But the encyclopedia adds that modern scholars are almost unanimous in rejecting this view, because the existing remains of the first three centuries show "considerable diversity of practice regarding the fast before Easter and also a gradual process of development in the matter of its duration."

"The passage of primary importance," it resumes, "is one quoted by Eusebius from a letter of St. Irenaeus to Pope Victor in connection with the Easter controversy. Irenaeus says there is not only a controversy about the time of keeping Easter, but also regarding the preliminary fast. 'For,' he continues, 'some think they ought to fast for one day, others for two days, and others for several, while others reckon forty hours both of day and night to their fast.'

"He also urges that this variety of usage is of ancient date, which implies that there could have been no apostolic tradition on the subject . . . We may then fairly conclude that Irenaeus about the year 190 knew nothing of any Easter fast of forty days. The same inference must be drawn from the language of Tertullian only a few years later. . . . And there is the same silence observable in all the pre-Nicene fathers, though many had occasion to mention such an apostolic institution if it had existed."

Pope Nicholas, who served from 858 to 867, declared that abstinence on Friday was obligatory on all communicants of the Roman church. Friday corresponds to the day of the week on which Jesus was crucified, and many of the early Christians were already observing it as a weekly fast day; that is, a day on which they abstained from eating flesh meats. Fish being the principal nonflesh meat, it accordingly became the favorite food for those days when flesh meats were forbidden. Also, the fish was one of the earliest symbols of Christianity.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The Law and the Prophets

"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them; for this is the law and the prophets."

Easter, the Birth of Sunday

EASTER, by the derivation of its name, is intimately connected with the East, the sun-rising, day-dawning point! It symbolizes for us the beginning of a new era, with death no longer a blank door closing upon human existence, opening upon only uncertainty or fear beyond; with sin no longer interposing a dense veil between mankind and an offended Creator.

Instead, it tells of life as the Spring-time of a glorious summer, illumined by the beauty of a gracious Father reconciled to mankind—of death as but the entrance to a fuller life in another sphere.

A new life-blessing Sun issued from the garden tomb on Easter morning, and ever since that day of the opened grave we have called the same first day of the week Sunday and made it a happy and should-be holy rest day as a weekly memorial of the most beneficent and most revolutionary event this earth has ever witnessed since upon it light was first made to shine.

Lesson for April 16

JESUS TRANSFIGURED

LESSON TEXT—Mark 9:2-29.

GOLDEN TEXT—And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth. John 1:14.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus God's Son.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Glory of Jesus.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Meaning of the Transfiguration.

In II Peter 1:16-18 is given an inspired interpretation of the transfiguration by one who was present and knew all that transpired. When Christ announced his death which was to take place on the cross, the disciples were greatly perplexed as to how victory could issue from death. Peter, James, and John accompanied Jesus into the mountain. They went there to pray (Luke 9:28).

In order to revive their drooping spirits and restore their confidence he was transfigured before them. Two men were sent from the realms above to talk with Jesus about his approaching death at Jerusalem (Luke 9:31)—the very thing about which the disciples had refused to talk (Mark 8:31-33). The transfiguration is, therefore, a foregleam of the coming Kingdom. It gives the outline of the order and method of the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom.

I. Jesus the King Glorified on the Mountain (vv. 2, 3).

He took the disciples "by themselves" and was "transfigured before them." This shows that the purpose of the transfiguration terminated upon the disciples and not upon Christ. Christ's rebuke to Peter for his unwillingness to hear concerning his death seemed for a time to estrange the disciples from him. His shining raiment was typical of that glory which shall be manifest when Christ comes back to earth. His appearance on the mountain typifies his visible appearance on the Mount of Olives (Zech. 14:4, 9).

II. Peter, James, and John Represent Israel in the Flesh in Connection With the Kingdom (v. 2).

Christ is peculiarly the King of Israel. According to Ezekiel 37:21-27, the Israelites are to be the central people in Messiah's Kingdom.

III. Moses and Elijah Appeared in Glory With Jesus (vv. 4-13).

These men in the glorified state are typical of the state of the saints in glory. Moses who was once denied an entrance into Palestine now appears in glory. He represented the redeemed of the Lord who shall pass through death into the Kingdom. Elijah represents the redeemed who shall pass into the Kingdom through translation. Some shall be living upon the earth when the Lord comes, who without dying shall be changed and thus pass into the Kingdom (I Cor. 15:50, 53; I Thess. 4:14-18).

1. Peter's proposal (vv. 5, 6). So definitely was the method of the Kingdom unfolded before Peter that he proposed to erect tabernacles, one for Christ, one for Moses, and one for Elijah. It is true that the unveiling of the majestic person of Christ somewhat disconcerted Peter, yet he grasped its central meaning and proposed to celebrate the advent of his Kingdom which had been prefigured in this tangible way.

2. The divine voice out of the cloud (vv. 7, 8). God declared Jesus to be his beloved Son in whom he was well pleased. The way to know what is pleasing to God is to study Jesus.

3. Christ's charge (vv. 9-13). He charged them that they should tell no man concerning the things which they had seen until he had risen from the dead.

IV. The Purpose of the Establishment of the Kingdom Demonstrated (vv. 14-29).

When they descended from the Mount of Transfiguration they witnessed a great multitude in a state of perplexity. The immediate cause of this state was the grievous condition of a young man possessed with a demon (v. 18), whose father had appealed to the disciples to cast out the demon, but they were unable to do so. When they brought him unto Jesus, the foul spirit was rebuked and came forth. This young man's state is representative of the nations who are grievously oppressed by the devil. Just as this young man was grievously oppressed, causing him to cast himself into the fire and into the waters, so the nations even today in their great perplexity are doing the things which will result in their own destruction. The devil will be peculiarly active in the oppression of men and nations in the last days.

Confess Christ

There cannot be a secret Christian. Grace is like ointment hid in the hand; it betrayeth itself. If you truly feel the sweetness of the cross of Christ, you will be constrained to confess Christ before men.—Robert McCheyne.

Unless we muse much on God's revelation of his word, no fires of zeal for his glory will glow in our souls.—D. O. Shelton in The Bible Today.

Time Chief Factor in Cooking Pork

Meat Absolutely Must Be Well Done, and Then It Is Delicious.

Pork is a term which actually covers all the meat which comes from the pig. We usually, however, think of it as the uncured and unsalted products of this animal. Bacon and ham are usually thought of as a different sort of meat, although a century or two ago the term "bacon" was used to cover all pork products. I have often heard persons say "we never eat pork in our household." Perhaps at that very moment we would be eating bacon at breakfast.

Of course, the term "ham" was originally applied to the hind portion of the pig, but it has come to mean either the ham or the shoulder, sometimes known as "picnic" ham after it is cured. "Fresh ham," on the contrary, actually refers to this cut.

Fresh pork is a delicious meat when properly cooked. It should always be thoroughly cooked, and even the thin cuts such as chops and steak need a comparatively long cooking. You may choose your beef or your lamb well done or rare, but pork must be well done. It will be perfectly wholesome as well as delicious under this treatment. Pork digests more slowly than other meats because of the streaks of fat which are found between the fibers, and for this reason it is excluded from the diet of little children and of persons who have digestive disturbance. Bacon, however, is usually to be found on the diet list of children and invalids.

In some household the spare ribs are considered one of the choicest delicacies among meats. There is nothing more appetizing than this cut, which takes, however, a good deal of effort in getting the dainty crisp morsels from the bone. Fingers rather than forks are in order when eating spare ribs in epicurean fashion.

Pork Tenderloin, Mushroom Stuffing.

Have two large tenderloins of pork split lengthwise so that they may be flattened out. Dredge in flour, salt and pepper. Cut fresh mushrooms in thin slices. Saute in butter and spread over one tenderloin, lay the other one on top and sew all around the edges. Brown on both sides, then add two tablespoons water, cover and cook slowly for at least one hour. Serve with a thin cream gravy.

Baked Pork Chops.

6 pork shoulder chops
2 onions, chopped
½ teaspoon sage
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
3 tablespoons chopped green pepper
⅛ teaspoon curry powder
¾ cup fine bread crumbs
2 cups tomato puree
Fat drippings

Roll chops in a mixture of the bread crumbs, salt, pepper, sage and curry powder. Saute them in hot drippings until brown. Place the chops in a casserole with the onion and green pepper chopped. Add the tomato puree, cover and cook in a slow oven, 300 degrees Fahrenheit, for two hours.

Quick Meal.

Broiled Ham
Baked Sweet Potatoes
Asparagus With Brown Butter
Cabbage and Pepper Salad
Grapefruit
Coffee

For the quick meal tonight I am suggesting that combination of broiled ham and baked sweet potatoes, which is such a good one. As you have discovered, sweet potatoes take a shorter time to bake than white potatoes—from 25 to 30 minutes only. If you light the oven as soon as you get home from the office it will be ready in about ten minutes. I like a very hot oven for sweet potatoes for the first fifteen minutes and than I lower the heat to moderate. Be sure to press the potatoes all over with a towel when you take them from the oven and to break them open at once. Cover with a towel if you are not ready to serve them. A thin slice of ham will broil or pan-broil in about ten minutes. Asparagus with brown butter or lemon butter combines well with this meal.

Grapefruit is so delicious just now that it is a good choice for dessert, served plain or with a little sweetened claret flavoring.

Order of Preparation.

Light oven
Scrub potatoes and bake
Open asparagus
Prepare salad
Prepare grapefruit
Cook ham
Make coffee
Dress asparagus

Ingenious Hiding Places

The pilgrims of the Middle ages carried stout staffs instead of sticks. These staffs were useful not only in supporting weary limbs but also served to break the heads of belligerent wayfarers. Each had in its upper part a hollow tube for small treasures and coins. In such a tube, it is said, the first head of saffron was smuggled into England from Greece when to take the living plant out of the country was forbidden on pain of death; the silkworm was conveyed into Europe in a similar way.

Ore Pail Turns Mining Town Into Ghost City

Sacramento, Calif. — A mile-high tram line, with its ore buckets creeping along glistening cables, is taking away the life blood of one of California's famous mining towns. Another "ghost" city is in the making.

Towns have boomed and then disappeared since the discovery of gold in 1848, but no exodus has been so strange as this one high over the glistening snows of the Sierra range.

The famous Walker copper mine virtually has been forced to cease operations. More than 350 men, most of them with families, will have to look for work elsewhere.

Snowdrifts 20 feet deep cut off the mine from civilization. The "tram" is the only way out.

So the population of the little town that has been built up around the mine is disappearing over the tramway—two at a time—eighteen a day at best. By the shortest route it is 70 miles.

It's a novel way to start looking for a new home. For nine miles the ore buckets wing over the mountains—the Grizzly range, 7,000 feet high—and the deep valleys so far below that giants look dwarfted—until Spring Garden and "civilization" finally are reached.

Quake Expert Studies Earth in Buried Vault

Santa Clara, Calif.—In a concrete vault 20 feet below ground on the University of Santa Clara campus, Dr. Albert J. Newland, disciple of the late Father Jerome Ricard, Jesuit "padre of the rains," conducts his "earthquake factory."

Every night for 25 years Doctor Newland has descended the narrow passage to the tomblike chamber, bolted the single, narrow door of the vault, and kept his vigil with the earth's quiverings and temblors.

Within the vault's 2-foot concrete walls, Doctor Newland checks the earth's tremblings, the expansion and contraction of its surface due to cold spells, heat waves, other causes. These are recorded by the "light pencils."

Doctor Newland's "earthquake factory" is buried deep in the ground so that surface vibration will not affect its delicate instruments. The seismographs, firmly lodged on a concrete pier, record the nature, location, and time of occurrence of disturbances.

Schubert's Inspiration

Schubert's "Who Is Silvia" is one of his best known compositions of its kind. At the writing of the piece, Schubert was unquestionably in love with the name, Silvia, or his conception of her. The song was inspired by Shakespeare's "Two Gentlemen of Verona." It is said that the song inspired Arthur Sullivan to write "Orpheus and His Lute." "Who Is Silvia" was published shortly after Schubert's death, together with three songs of 1827 (later called Opus 106), which were dedicated to Marie Pachler, Schubert's kind hostess in Graz.

Cotton in History

Cotton has been used for clothing by some of this world's inhabitants from a very early date. But it was first introduced to Europe from India and the Arab traders who were the middle men in the transaction passed along their own name for it—qutun or qutn. This Arab word, in various forms, has entered into most of the European languages. Thus there have been derived not only the English "cotton," but the French "cotton," German "kattun," Italian "cotone," Portuguese "cotao," and so on. The original word was probably a name applied to a people who employed cotton or to a place where it was grown.

Idle Forfeit Labor Fees Through Trick

London.—"Will six unemployed men go at once to the entrance hall, where they will be given particulars of a job."

This announcement flashed on the screen at a Kennington cinema was immediately followed by a rush of unemployed men.

In the entrance hall they found a man who stated that he needed six men for special work. He said he would take a number of names and addresses and let them know later who had been selected.

But the men heard nothing further until they visited the labor exchange to draw their weekly benefit.

Then, according to labor circles, those whose names had been taken were informed that their unemployment pay would be stopped for six weeks, as they had been found to be frequenters of cinemas instead of using their benefit money for desirable purposes.

Rabelais Letter Sold

Paris.—A letter signed by Francois Rabelais was sold at auction here for $2,644. Written in Latin and Greek, the letter was addressed to Guillaume Bude, and was dated "Fontenay-le-Comte, 4e. jour avant les nones de Mars,' probably in the year 1522. The letter was part of the Henry Fatio collection of autographs.

Improvement Suggested

Joe was particularly fond of a variety of chocolate cookies which came all weighed out for the convenience of the purchaser in a heavy waxed-paper bag. Mother had been obliged to limit his gustatory activities in that line, for there seemed to be no limit to his capacity. The other day when she heard the rustling of waxed paper in the pantry she called out:

"Stay out of those cookies, mister!"

In came Joe, with his face frescoed with chocolate crumbs, and remarked ruefully:

"Why don't they put those cookies up in sound-proof packages?"

Uncover Indians' Bones

Near Mountain View, Calif., where once the [illegible] Indians buried their dead, a new highway cuts through, symbolic of the progress that drove the tribe from its once vast hunting ground. Road crews working on the new Bayshore highway recently uncovered the graves of five of the Indians, together with beads, mortars, and other paraphernalia buried with them to insure their happiness and comfort in the Happy Hunting Ground. The bones and other remnants were reburied alongside the right-of-way.

AN EASTER LUNCHEON

IT'S April 16th this year—that Easter date that we all associate with Easter bunnies, Easter bulbs and Easter bonnets. It has become almost synonymous with entertaining, also, because the Lenten fast is over, and, like the pagans of long ago, we feel it a fitting time to feast and be glad.

Let an Easter rabbit bear your luncheon invitation and bid him hop around through the mail, to a half dozen or more friends with the tidings. A clever bunny invitation is a very little cardboard rabbit with very long ears, bearing the lines:

"I'm all ears to hear if you can come
To my Easter luncheon—to be served at one.
Name .... Date ...."

An Easter garden is an attractive idea for your table decorations, and green and yellow, or other pastel shades are appropriate for the color scheme. A table cloth of delicate green with glasses of topaz, which can be bought very inexpensively, will give a floral appearance to your table. For the centerpiece, build a miniature rock garden on a bed of asparagus ferns. Fill a low bowl with various Easter flowers—daffodils, tulips, narcissi and jonquils, and then build up tiny rocks around the bowl, letting the blooms come between the rocks to give the idea of a growing garden. For favors, place at each plate a tiny bowl with a growing Easter bulb in bloom.

EASTER LUNCHEON MENU

Iced Orange and Grapefruit Soup
Chicken and Mushroom Loaf with Sour Cream Sauce
Parsley Potato Balls
Glazed Carrot Slices
Cloverleaf Rolls Tart Jelly
French Artichokes with French Dressing
Cup Cakes with Peach Whipped Cream
Crystallized Ginger
Coffee Orange Mints

Iced Orange and Grapefruit Soup: Soak two tablespoons gelatin in four tablespoons cold water for five minutes, then dissolve in juice from a No. 2 can of grapefruit which has been brought to the boiling point. Add six tablespoons sugar, three and one-half cups orange juice and six tablespoons lemon juice. Shred the grapefruit fine and add with six tablespoons of oroettes (yellow skinned grapes). Tint a deeper yellow, if desired. Chill, stirring often to prevent a solid mixture. Just before serving, beat well to break up the jelly. Serve ice cold in glasses.

Chicken and Mushroom Loaf: Chop the contents of a 12-ounce can of chicken and the contents of an 8-ounce can of mushrooms fine. add four tablespoons chopped green pepper, two teaspoons horseradish, one teaspoon salt, and one-fourth teaspoon pepper, then add a cup and a half of soft crumbs and three eggs which have been slightly beaten. Add the mushroom liquor to make moist but not too wet. Place a few slices of bacon on the bottom of a greased loaf pan, pack in the mixture, place more bacon on top and bake in a hot oven—400 degrees—for about forty-five minutes. Turn out on a hot platter, and serve with sour cream sauce.

Cup Cakes with Peach Whipped Cream: Boil one-half cup sugar and one-third cup water to 238 degrees, or the thread stage. Pour slowly over four well-beaten egg yolks, beating constantly until cool. Add three-fourths cup of mashed canned peaches, which have been drained, and almond flavor to taste. Add six macaroons rolled or broken into small pieces and one-half cup of beaten cream. Serve over delicate little cup cakes. The mixture may be tinted with yellow coloring to carry out the yellows in the menu.

BAPTIST CHURCH

Service For Church Officials

Next Sunday morning we shall have a special service featuring the officers of the church. How much do you know about the work done by the officers of the church? How many of the officers do you know? Do you know who the deacons are? Do you know what organizations there are in the church and who carries them on?

The purpose of this service are to get acquainted with our official family, to consider our responsibilities, to worship together in the light of these responsibilities, to reconsecrate ourselves to our official duties, and to reconsecrate ourselves as members to cooperation with our leaders. This should be one of the greatest services of the year.

Your place next Sunday is in your church. Your highest privilege is to worship your God. Your highest duty is to give yourself to the service of God through cooperation with your church. We shall look for you Sunday.

NEW ORGANIZATION IS FORMED HERE

The first regular meeting of the newly organized Shelby County Technical and Clerical Workers Association was held in the Legion Hut on Monday night. Similar to an organization started last week in Jefferson Couny, which has already sent a committee to Washington to confer with the President, the purpose of the Shelby County group is stated as follows:

"The object in this association shall be to present to the proper authorities the needs of the group, and to bring any legitimate pressure to bear, to the end that we may be privided an opportunity to secure jobs whereby we may be enabled to gain an honest and decent standard living."

Article Two of the Constitution as adopted at the meeting concerns membership all citizens of Shelby County who are in any sense technical or clerical workers, or so-called "white-collar" workers, especially those who are unemployed or who may become unemployed."

Haywood Wooley, temporary President of the organization, presided. He appointed membership and other committees and urged that all citizens in the county who are eligible join immediately. This is a day of group action said Mr. Wooley. We must co-operate organize, and make known our plight. We want a decent standard of living, and want to work for it, not beg for it, he concluded.

About 25 men were in attendance. Another meeting was announced for Monday night, May 7. At this meeting a large attendance is expected fro mdifferent parts of the county.

Mrs. S. A. Latham is at home greeting her many friends after spending three weeks in Sylacauga visiting Mrs. Ella Mitchell.

ALABAMA HOMES USE MOORE POWER FOR LESS MONEY

Birmingham, Ala., April 30 —Homes served by Alabama Power Company in cities and towns in Alabama paid electric bills in March, 1934, totaling $18,090 less than in March, 1933, but used 451,000 more kilowatt hours, a study of the new household rate reveals. 10. 7 per cent more electricity was used for 8. 7 per cent less money.

The average price paid by home users in March, 1934, was 4. 02 per cent per kilowatt hour against 4. 97 cents in March 1933, a reduction of 19 per cent.

If the 451,000 more kiliwatt hours used in March, 1934 had been paid for at March 1933 average price, it would have cost $45,513 more than was actually paid. The annual savings to Alabam homes for electricity on that basis amount to $546,000, compared to the estimate of $366,000 at the time the rate was reduced.

Millers Militia Well Pleased With Elections

Folks I'm too sleepy to write and too mixed up on recent happenings to know just what to say. To the many of you who have patiently awaited for my comments on the elections let me say I'm well pleased, on the whole. My constituency has taken my advice for the most part. The populace has made some wise selections, in county and state. The good old Southern courtesy remains in Montevallo as shown by the overwhelming vote for the only lady on the county ticket. Once in a moment of frenzied ebullition for a lost cause I ungallantly defined the female race as one given to immense verbosity, to fickleness and to lack of tenacity. I am ready to confess my sin and take it all back. Women are going in for the real tasks of life and makin good. They use to waste their time doin such insignificant contributions to the general welfare as rearing the next generation cookin, washing dishes, and other trivialities that took only 14 to 20 hours per day. Back then we men folks did not think much of their ability, but now we find they can adapt themselves to such tasks as sittin around offices, and doin other important political duties. The hope is that as they enter politicis there will be some hang-over and that they will do some work.

Human Nature and Politics

All of which reminds me to state in politics as nowhere else the sinuosities of human nature will out. Trustin that I still repose under the canopy of a sound brain, I want to say I believe some men run for office in the very hope that they will henceforth have as much spare time as Mahatma Ghandi's taylor. Sittin in a swivel chair with all the dignity of a Russian plenipotentiary they dream of a hyperborean paradise served by a race of super-astute diplomats one of whom they are which They have hoped to feast on a succulent composition of all the delectable ambrosias on the calendar, but lo, the populace has spoken. Many felt called and few were chosen. Some mistakes were doubtless made. Some who deserved election were defeated, but such is life.

As ever,
Gus.

Bible Verse For This Week

Something to Remember

Woe unto thee that spoilest, and thou wast not spoiled; and dealest treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee! When thou cease to spoil, thou sh alt not be spoiled; and when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherausly with thee.—Isiah 33, 1.

It is easier to excuse our bad habits than to overcome them.

The life of a dollar bill is said to be seven or eight months. We knew it must be short, most of them die before they get to us.

Uncle Sam's credit apparently reains quite good. Recently a billion dollars worth of 2½ per cent bonds were offered for sale. The issue was oversubscribed four times.

It is a fine distinction to be thrifty and to be able to handle money and at the same time not get the reputation for being tight and stingy and penurious.

If young people could attend school with the viewpoint they secure some twenty-five years after they leave school, some remarkable scholastic records would result,

Some contend that torture of human beings is a thing of the past. but did you ever have a fellow who really doesn't know any more about it than you do, try to explain to you the moeny question.

This dissatisfaction that will not prompt a man to rise up and do better things is the wrong kind of dissatisfaction it is harmful. The dissatisfaction that will prompt a man to rise up and do better is a whole some dissatisfaction.

One of the results of the depressoin if it last long enough is going to be that a lot of special privileges enjoyed by certain classes in this country are going to be wiped out and the coddled big business man is going to be put on an equal basis with others.

The first surprise a man gets in this life is how little he is able to startle the world with his genius. His biggest disappointment comes when he realizes that he is not going to do but a few of the things that he thought he would have accomplished by the time he was fifty years old.

FIGHT THEM WITH THEIR OWN WEAPONS

The sales of the country's largest mail-order house were $257,930,025 in 1931, as against $190,523,047 in 1930—an increase of nearly 30 per cent.

Think of all that money going to an outside concern Mr. Merchant—and that is only one of 2,530 mail-order houses in the United States, all of which are taking business away from you.

These concerns have a way of presenting showily a few values which are distributed strategically through the page of their catalogs amongst a lot of other offerings which can be beaten almost anywhere, if people would take the trouble to look around.

The community wrecking habit of buying merchandise away from home is growing stronger every year, as is evidenced by the enormous increase in sales each year by this one firm alone.

The speediest and most effective means of checking the activities of these community wrecking business vampires is to fight them with their own weapons—persistent advertising.

Not only is the welfare of your home town at stake in keeping trade at home, but the success of your business is is contingent upon a complete and loyal patronage by your customers.

The big illustrated catalogs of the mail-order houses now lie on the tables in the great majority of homes in your trade territory. Is your message of the new and better things in merchandise going into these same homes regularly through your home newspaper?

Regular newspaper advertising, together with good descriptive advertising copy, is the only weapon with which to fight mail-order competition in your community.

Simply give the home folks all the facts regarding the merchandise you are selling and tell them how they can save time and money in taknig advantage of the high grade merchandise offerings, and the efficient service which your store renders at all times.

R. A. Long, who died recently in Kansas City, Mo., left an estate of less than a million. Ten years ago Long's fortune was conservatively estimated at 30 milions. At that time he wrote a will in which he made bequests totaling 30 million. Due to shrinkage in the estate few of the bequests will be made.

Our childlike faith that the world is getting better and that the race is becoming more intelligent received a severe shock the other day when we learned that some moron had made application to Will Hayes moving picture Czar, for permission to film a picture showing the life of the outlaw, Dillinger. It is disconcerting when one considers that there are still enough morons in the country who would pay money to see such a picture.

MY PROJECT STORY

By Annie Pearl Perry

Concerning My Project

In the white house on the hill lives the father, mother, son of eleven, and daughter who is none other than I, myself. I am taking Home Economics II and am conducting a one-hundred fifty hour project which has several phases.

Last fall I decided to take a food project to learn more about meal planning, preparations, and service. I have learned to prepare new dishes and have improved on speed in preparation. I am now able to make a much better biscuit than the ones I made before my project work was begun. I have ha ddifficulties as well as successes but perhaps I wouldn't have had accomplished as much had I not had these difficulties. Not having had very much experience in food preparation and planning, I received some help on this; but now I am not afraid to undertake the entire responsibility of a meal without the smallest amount of aid.

Before the Christmas holidays began I made plans for a family relationship project to improve home life and make it more enjoyable. The main emphasis has been laid on recreation. During the holidays, I added "Christmas-y" touches to our home by decorating a tree for the living room and by decorating the table for the Christmas dinner with fruit, celophane, and candles. Recreation has been conduced and a family scrap book containing ancestorial data and pictures has been begun. I have enjoyed this project and should like to advise other girls to take a project of this type.

As ours was the first family to have lived where our home is located, the home grounds were not indicative of a good background for a present day-home. I had, had a home grounds project in view, so in January I made plans for a project of this kind. My purpose was to improve the appearance of the home and the home grounds. I have done cleaning, set out shrubbery and planted flower seed. By the time this project has been completed I expect to have a lawn set out, a drive-way and walk and fence constructed, rustic furniture built, a flower garden and some porch boxes made, and the general appearance of the site a decided improvement over its former appearance.

After the three already mentioned projects were begun, I decided I would like to take a short inexpensive bedroom project. The closet curtains had a faded appearance and the dressing table drapes too, had faded. In the room were green swinging shelves and a green magazine stand, and also a trunk not new, and not very pleasing from a standpoint of art or beauty. My dressing table drapes contained rose and blue. The room as a whole was not very harmonious. There was already some cretonne on hand, so after considering some things I wanted to do. I planned to make a trunk cover, drapes for th edressing table, and a stool. I also planned to wash and dye the closet curtains, stain floors, make a rug, and do general cleaning. My window curtains were cream; these and the closet curtains I dyed green. From the cretonne I made dressing table drapes and covered a keg which I converted into a stool and have made with it pillows, and covering for the trunk. I am wokring for a more attractive and livable bedroom and one that I will appreciate.

Before this school year has come to an end, I expect to end my project work with a clothing project by taking care of my clothing and by making new garments for myself and others.

A LESSON FOR PARENTS

Parents nowadays are accustomed to children's thinking themselves wiser than their elders. They are used to being called old-fashioned and charged with notions that do not "click" with the times.

Parents always smile knowingly to themselves when their offspring asseverate this superior intelligence. They will be properly shocked to know that some experts have now come along and proved the contention of the children. According to the American magazine Harvard scientists have just completed 18 months research on the subject from records going back to 1870. However, shocking it may prove to the oldsters, this survey shows that the average American boy or girl is more intelligent, taller heavier and healthier than was his father and mother, at the same age.

When the boys and girls find this out they are of course going to be too intelligent to point a finger and say I told you so.—Alabama Journal.

As the wider dissemination of information progresses we discover that many of the men in this country who we have been led to believe were giants in the business world are big because they have received special privileges that others did not receive. Their success has not been the result of pure merit but rather of special favors. Before the man who merely carries on a business that has been left him, or who has been able to achieve his success through privilges that others do not enjoy, permits himself to suffer a swelled head he should take a look at the little fellow who started out on a shoe string and who has won a success with no special privileges or favors. Most any small town business man, if he had been given the favors and privileges that many businesses in this country have received, would, instead of being a small town business man, be a captain of finance.

Many towns and communities throughout the Southland the heroes and heroines of the Confederacy were honored with fitting exercises on Thursday. They are rapidly passing away and soon all will have gone to their homes in the better world. Let's make the pathway of each one of them brighter as the days go by.

ALABAMA COLLEGE FORENSIC CLUB GRANTED MEMBERSHIP TO PI KAPPA DELTA

Alabama College Forensic Club was granted membership to Pi Kappa Delta, national honorary forensic fraternity, at the recent convention of that organization in Lexington, Kentucky. Forty schools petitioned for membership but only thirteen new chapters including th eone at Monte-vallo, were admitted, it was announced.

Pi Kappa Delta was established at Ripon College in 1913 and nine other chapters were organized at that time. Auburn and the University of Alabama are the only other schools in the state with chapters of Pi Kappa Delta.

A national officer from Milsaps College, Jackson, Miss., will visit Alabama College soon to install the chapter. The success of Alabama College debate teams and efforts of its faculty advisors have been laregly instrumental in bringing the chapter here.

New officers for the Pi Kappa Delta chapter are Misses Alice Stallworth, Monroeville, president; Martha Lowery, Birmingham, vice-president; Nell Hines, Childersburg, secretary and Betty Bishop, Irvington, treasurer and reporter. Other members are Misses Eunice Thomas, Atmore; Agnes Plant Birmingham; Majorie Goff, Enterprise; Vivian Booker, Carbon Hill; Margaret Ellis, Columbiana; Mray Inez Layfield, Warrior; Annie Laura Beckham, Selma and Martha Lowery, Birmingham.

Miss Ellen-Haven Gould, of the speech department, is faculty advisor for the chapter. Other faculty members of the debate committee are Dr. A. W. Vaughan, Dr. J. R. Steelman, Dr. Hallie Farmer and Mrs .Mary M. McCoy.

Members of Alabama College faculty were heard in talks and music numbers in the radio program which was broadcast from the Palmer Hall stage Sunday afternoon.

M. Ziolkowski presented a group of delightful piano selections. Katherine Farrah, soprano, accompanied by Mr. Ziolkowski, rendered several pleasing numbers, including "For You," by Vivian Burnett and Plaisir d' Amour, by Martini.

Mrs. W. H. Trumbauer, of the English department, read "The Little White Goat," Dorothy Lathrop; and "Blue Barns," Helen Sewell, while Miss Alice Green, Fairfield, a major in the department of speech, gave a group of readings also.

BANKHEAD IS SELECTED FLOOR LEADER

JOSEPH BYRNS OF TENN. IS NEW HOUSE SPEKER

Congressman William B. Bankhead of Alabama was chosen as majority floor leader in the lower house at the party caucus this week. Congressman Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee was elected Speaker of the House at the opening session Thursday.

Congressman Bankhead was elected to the floor leadership on the second ballot leading a field of several candidates, but was prevented by illness from being present at the initial session The selection of Mr. Bankhead and Mr. Byrns gives the south more recognition in Congress than it has had in many years.

Democrats dominate both branches of the new Congress with sixty nine Senate seats to twenty-five Republicans, one Farm-Labor and one Progressive. In the lower house the margin is even greater with 322 Democrats, 102 Republicans, three Farm-Labor, seven progressives and one vacancy.

Among the first items to be considered by Congress is the Bonus bill which seems to have considerable backing despite the attitude of the administration. The New Deal. it is expected, will come in for its share of attention, with most observers granting Mr. Roosevelt's ability to get about what he wants along this line from Congress.

The President is to deliver his speech to the combined branches in person today.

GRAVES FAVORS CONSERVATION

Montgomery, Ala.— With the groundwork for co-ordinated effort between the state and federal conservation agencies already laid, Alabama's wildlife program for the new year will have the added support of a conservation-minded governor.

Gov.-elect Bibb Graves has stated emphatically that he favors the development of the state's wildlife resources and Alabama sportsmen may reasonably expect progressiveness in step with the broad conservation program undertaken by the federal government during the next four years.

In viewing the game and fish picture of the past year Commissioner I. T. Quinn found little cause for pessimism. The improvement in economic conditions, he said, brought more hunters back into the field and sent more fishermen to the banks of streams to fish. Of great significance was the tendency of the sports

Birmingham — Opening of the new four-lane highway over Red Mountain, previously announced for Jan. 1, had been postpone dtoday until Feb. 1. The postponement was necessitated by decision of the Alabama Highway Department not to open the highway until the bridge over the cave-in at the top of the mountain is completed.

Previously it had been announced that the half of the width of the highway that runs on solid ground next to the bridge would be opened Jan. 1, with the part that runs over the bridge to be opened a month later.

It was later decided that to open the highway over half its width at this point would result in a "bottleneck" which would endanger motorists.

F.D.R. FROWNS ON SOLDIERS BONUS

Washington—A spectacular and bitter battle on the soldiers bonus issue appeared inevitable today as sharp lines of conflict were drawn between President Roosevelt and the politically powerful organizations representing America's war veterans..

Determination of the American Legion to press for cash payment of adjusted service certificates was announced 24 hours after Mr. Roosevelt made known his opposition to the plan.

The conflict shaped up in this forceful fashion as the nation awaited opening of the Seventy-four Congress tomorrow and the President's annual message on the following day.

In between the two extremes of opinion on the bonus issue is a group advising compromise. Some of these held that Presirent Roosevelt's letter to a Texas Leginnaire, condemning bonus proposals, did not necessarily close the door to an adjustment on a compromise basis.

Loyalty vs. Lobby

It was regarded as certain, however, that Mr. Roosevelt would veto any bill enacted by Congress for immediate payment.

Democratic congressmen were torn between two influences—loyalty to the White House and political power to the veterans' lobby.

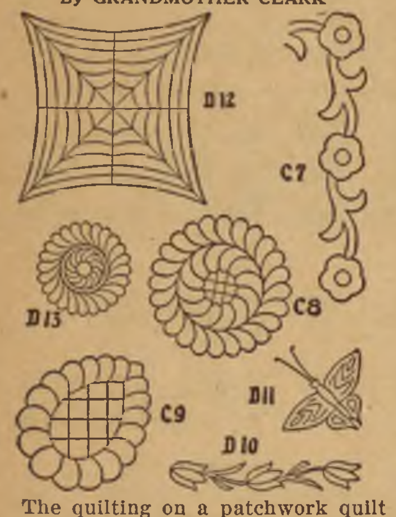
Get Perfect Quilt With This Design

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



The quilting on a patchwork quilt may make or ruin the entire work, if the design and work is not done neatly. Beauty in the design is necessary, but the needlework and evenness of the stitches bring out the design, and if done right the result will be perfect and always admired. Needleworkers know the best way to transfer a design to cloth is through a perforated pattern. The design is perfectly drawn and perforated so that each stamping is alike and requires very little time. The stamping powder can be brushed off when work is finished, leaving no lines or marks.

Representative Tinkham's Scathing Attack on Secretary Perkins—Senator Lewis Warns Against Any More Disarmament Treaties.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

GEORGE H. TINKHAM, the bearded and sharp-tongued representative from Massachusetts, has revived the controversy over the League of Nations with an assertion that the United States is being slipped into the league through the back door. He says the joint resolution adopted in the last few days of the Seventy-third congress, making the United States a member of the international labor organization was the first of a contemplated series of moves designed to put the United States openly into the league, contrary to the wishes of the people and of congress, and Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins was the especial object of his attack. Using such harsh words as "fraud" and "intrigue," Mr. Tinkham accused Secretary Perkins of employing "contemptible trickery" in advocating the adoption of the resolution.

Secretary Perkins

Mr. Tinkham quoted the labor secretary as saying that the international labor organization, "is not even now an integral part of the League of Nations, and membership in the organization does not imply affiliation with the league." He continued:

"This statement is the grossest perversion of the truth. It is squarely contrary to the facts—facts established by an indelible record, the treaty of Versailles. The statement contained in the letter of the secretary of labor was intended to deceive. The secretary knew that the congress of the United States was opposed to entry into the League of Nations and would not vote for entry knowingly. Entry was therefore made surreptitiously and fraudulently.

"Article 392 of the treaty of Versailles states:

"'The international labor office shall be established at the seat of the League of Nations as part of the organization of the league.'

"This audacious intrigue to have the United States enter the League of Nations by way of one of the organs of the league is to be followed by an attempt to have the United States enter another of its organs, the Permanent Court of International Justice of the League of Nations, this subsequently to be followed by a proposal of full membership in the League of Nations. Thus, the independence of the United States will be destroyed, the will of the American people thwarted, and the United States inevitably involved in the next European conflict."

SENATOR JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS of Illinois, chairman of the senate committee on foreign relations and a veteran in international conferences, has set forth a view concerning treaties for disarmament or reduction of armaments that will meet with the approval of many of his fellow citizens, though they are sharply at variance with those of the administration. He evidently is glad the Washington naval pact is dying, owing to the action of Japan, and he says that in future the United States must, for its own sake, remain aloof from all such agreements, because they are almost certain to embroil us in war.

Senator Lewis

Addressing the National Forum in Washington, Senator Lewis declared the recent naval conversations in London succeeded only in designing a "chart of death to men, destruction to nations," and he warned against the renewal of the Washington treaty.

"Plain it must be," Senator Lewis pointed out, "that should we enter the deal, and it is disobeyed by any of its parties, the United States must be called on by the nations involved to lend ourselves to enforce the compact. This means war upon the United States by the nations we threaten to force to obedience, or war from the nations we refuse to aid in the enforcement.

"To the United States nothing but evil and danger awaits our entrance into any international contract with foreign nations preparing for war on each other."

America wants no war and wants armaments only for self-defense, the senator said, and America does not recognize the right of any international conference to tell her what arms she needs for that purpose.

"On this right of our own self-defense America stands sovereign in her guarded isolation," he informed other ntaions. "We deny the privilege of any nation to dictate to the United States the quantity or quality of protection our nation shall adopt."

War can come to the United States only through her foreign entanglements, Senator Lewis explained, and because of the present warlike attitude of the world, America must stand isolated.

SPEAKING of war, it is interesting to learn that the senate mission to the Philippines has discovered that those islands "possess the most important source of war material under the American flag." Senator Tydings of Maryland sent the word from Manila that there are in Zambales province deposits of chromite so large that they have attracted the attention of other nations. John W. Haussermann, dean of the islands' gold mining industry, told the senators these deposits may soon take their place as one of the most important ore bodies in the world, and he added significantly that chromium is the one war material which the United States does not have in ample quantities within its borders. These deposits in the Philippines were discovered after the Tydings-McDuffie independence act was drafted. It is easy to see that this news will be of immense interest to Japan, which, in its plans for territorial expansion, is ever on the lookout for war material sources.

POPE PIUS XI is not optimistic concerning world peace. In his Christmas eve address, delivered according to custom to the cardinals resident in Rome, the Holy Father said that "the clamor of war spreads ever farther," and he urged the world to pray and work for peace. "We see a constant increase in warlike arms," the pope continued.

"This is a distracting element in which the spirit seems to have no part. We are on the eve of a day when the heavens resound with the hymns of angels calling for peace on earth. Never has the chant had more reason for being than today."

King George, in a radio address to all parts of the British empire, was a little more cheerful. He adjured his "peoples beyond the seas" to remember that they all belonged to one great family.

"My desire and hope is that the same spirit of brotherhood may become ever stronger in its hold and wider in its range," the king said. "The world is sitill restless and troubled. The clouds are lifting, but we have still our own anxieties to meet. I am convinced that if we meet them in the spirit of one family we shall overcome them, for then private and party interests will be controlled by care for the whole community."

He made a special effort to reach the restless multitudes in India, whose fate now is in the hands of parliament, by assuring them of his "constant care of them."

President Roosevelt's brief Christmas talk was addressed especially to the citizens of America, calling for "courage and unity," for greater happiness and the improvement of human welfare.

PROSECUTION and defense attorneys completed their proparations for the trial of Bruno Hauptmann on the charge of murdering the Lindbergh baby, and the little town of Flemington, N. J., was a busy place. The names of 48 veniremen were drawn for examination as jurors, and the sensation over the mailing of a satire on the Lindbergh case to 150 prospective jurors died down. C. Lloyd Fisher, defense counsel, said he would not ask for a new panel.

Bruno Hauptmann

Betty Gow, the nurse who put the Lindbergh baby to bed the night he was kidnaped and killed, arrived from Scotland on the liner Aquitania and went at once to the Morrow home in Englewood, N. J., to await her call as one of the state's star witnesses. She declined to talk to reporters, but posed for cameramen. There was a report that Miss Gow might remain in this country and take up her former job in the Lindbergh household. She had acted as nurse for Jon, second son born to the Lindberghs, until she returned to her home in Scotland several months ago.

Hauptmann seemed calm as the time for his ordeal approached, and he ate a hearty Christmas dinner. Mrs. Hauptmann, who moved from the Bronx to Flemington to be near her husband, made a radio appeal "to the people of the country to wait until they hear every side of the story before they condemn him."

She reiterated her belief that Hauptmann had nothing to do with the kidnaping of Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr. She repeated her story that Hauptmann had waited for her at a Bronx bakery where she worked the night of the kidnapping and that he had taken her home.

As for the ransom money found in the Hauptmann home and garage, she insisted on the truth of her husband's story that he got the money from Isidor Fish, who is dead. Mrs. Hauptmann told parts of her story amid sobs.

ONE of the worst American railway-wrecks of the year occurred at Dundas, Ont., when a Christmas excursion train bound from London, Ont., to Toronto was telescoped by the Detroit-to-Toronto express on the Canadian National railways line as it stood on a siding. Apparently the express ran through the open switch. Two wooden coaches were demolished, and about fifteen persons were killed. More than a score of others were injured. A third coach was thrown on end close to the edge of a 150-foot cliff.

The alertness and quick thinking of Engineer B. Burrell of the speeding train from Detroit, was credited by railway officials with having averted an even greater tragedy. Seeing no hope of preventing the locomotive from piling into the rear of the special train, Burrell ordered it cut loose from the coaches behind and prevented them from telescoping.

SOLDIERS from Great Britain, Italy Sweden and Holland, to the number of 3,300, under the command of Maj. J. E. S. Brind, a British veteran of several wars, marched into the Saar from north and south with flying colors, and were stationed at strategic points throughout the area, prepared to maintain order until after the plebiscite of January 13 which will determine whether the Saar shall again become a part of Germany or remain under control of the League of Nations. The arrival of the troops was watched by the league authorities with considerable anxiety for there had been fears that Nazi enthusiasts there might cause trouble. But the inhabitants of the basin remained quiet, none of them showing either enmity or enthusiasm for the league's armed forces.

Major Brind

Under the terms of the treaty of Versailles any person living in the Saar at the time of the signing of the treaty is eligible to vote in the plebiscite, and the Nazis of Germany made great efforts to gather as many of their adherents as possible from other lands to which they had migrated. From the United States 352 Saar Germans traveled back to their old home aboard the liner Bremen, and were welcomed with feasts, as was another large contingent from South America. The German government denied that it was paying the expenses of these voters from abroad, asserting they were financed by private donations.

PEACE in central Europe was promoted by two events. The Jugoslavian cabinet resigned and a new cabinet was formed with Bogoljub Yevtitch as premier. As foreign minister he had conducted the case of his country against Hungary before the League of Nations and accepted the compromise decision, and he is a close friend of Prince Paul, head of the regency, who is inclined to a moderate course.

The Austrian government refused the extradition to France of Colonel Perchevich, Croat exile, who was accused, along with Dr. Ante Pavelich, of instigating the assassination of King Alexander in Marseilles. Italy had previously refused the extradition of Pavelich. It is said in informed quarters that further examination of these two men would have revealed facts that would have endangered peace in Europe.

COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH, by his flights across Arctic regions in 1933, has enabled the Department of Agriculture to demonstrate conclusively that the spores of plant disease can be borne on remote air currents.

With a spore trap of his own devising, which he called "the skyhook," Colonel Lindbergh obtained specimens which confirmed the previous theories of government experts that plant diseases may be carried even across continents by air currents.

That was announced by Fred C. Meier, the department expert who interested Colonel Lindbergh in the work.

Colonel Lindbergh devised his "the skyhook," a light, strong contrivance, easy to operate and well adapted to protecting sterile glass slides from contamination except for the time they were exposed. Mr. Meier prepared the slides and has examined and photographed them. He credits Colonel Lindbergh with careful work.

AFTER winning the handicap prize in the England-to-Melbourne air race, the giant American-built plane Uiver, pride of the Royal Dutch Air Lines, started on a speed flight from Amsterdam to Batavia, Java, with seven persons aboard. During a thunderstorm it crashed in the desert ten miles from Rutba Wells, Irak, and burned to cinders, all its occupants perishing.

MARTIN J. INSULL, brother of Samuel, was given a Christmas present by a Chicago jury in the form of a verdict of not guilty of embezzlement from the Middle West Utilities company. The money, $344,720, was used, according to the prosecution, in a desperate effort to recoup Insull's personal losses in the stock market.

FOR the first time the RFC has undertaken the management of a railroad. John W. Barriger, chief examiner for the interstate commerce commission, announced that nominees of the RFC would be placed in charge of operation of the Denver & Salt Lake railway, which has received large loans from the government agency.

The railway is a short road which has leased for 50 years the railroad bore of the Moffat tunnel from the Moffat Tunnel Improvement district.

BRISBANE THIS WEEK

A Pretty Good Christmas
Germs Travel High
We Are Coughing Better
Prairie Dogs, Catacombs

It was a satisfactory Christmas, the best since the depression began. The nation at least knows that the depression is here and that attending to it, instead of talking about things "just around the corner," is the program.

The government knows that money was made to be spent in emergencies and that helping the people is cheaper than revolution. The government is spending and helping.

Colonel Lindbergh proves, after transatlantic flights, that bacteria can travel across the ocean by air. The winds of the north Atlantic carry microscopic germs of life through the upper air. Disease germs might travel, thus, across either ocean.

That interests anybody planning to make war more interesting by adding disease germs to poison gas and high explosives.

Scientists already believed that, since life cannot be created on the earth, except supernaturally, life began on this planet probably with germs that had traveled millions, perhaps billions, of miles through space at absolute zero. They started life on the earth when it had sufficiently cooled off, and may have been brought in the wake of flying meteors.

Heat destroys microscopic life, cold does not.

Cheerful optimists, telling you that conditions are getting better, remind you of Meyer Hecht's benevolent friend who told each tuberculosis patient, "You are coughing better this morning."

We all are "coughing" a little better. It has been the best, most freely spending Christmas season since the depression began. Merchants testify to that. The season of grand opera opened in New York with every seat sold and a demand for seats nonexistent.

Mr. Hull, able secretary of state, wants freer trade with foreign countries. Those that shut their markets to the outside world are like "animals which burrow in the ground," says Mr. Hull. That might be true, without proving that protection is unwise.

Animals burrowing in the ground—prairie dogs, etc.—would regret it if they came to the surface and sat around inviting coyotes to eat them. Early Christians burrowing in the catacombs were better off than they would have been on the surface, thrown to the lions.

It is better for this country to burrow under protection than be thrown to the lions of free competition of labor and manufacturing.

Occasionally you hear what Mr. Field called "a sour note" in the hopeful chorus of "Happy Days Are Here Again." Senator Dickinson of Iowa—Republican, of course—says NRA plans have collapsed. He finds that "monopoly" is being encouraged, private initiative is being depressed and the small business man driven to the wall—"The rich are becoming richer and the poor poorer."

That will be news for some of the rich—they had not heard it. You may hear many of them say now, "If I can get together and keep enough to take care of my family, that is all I ask," and they mean it.

Projects thus far proposed by congressmen and executives in Washington would cost Uncle Sam, in addition to money already spent, $30,000,000,000, and would double the national debt. If the money were wisely created, wisely spent, the country would be better off, with many employed in useful work. But if it is found necessary to inflate with interest-bearing bonds, instead of simply printing the money and later retiring it as bonds would be retired, the $30,000,000,000 would cost the country $60,000,000,000.

Is it really necessary to force on taxpayers that extra load of $30,000,000,000 for interest, when interest bonds are just so much "inflation money," in no respect different from greenbacks?

According to dispatches from Nanking, China's killing methods make the efforts of Stalin or Hitler seem feeble. Gen. Kiang Kai-Shek gives proof in Kiangsi province. Six million people have been driven from their homes and 1,000,000 killed in cold blood by "Red Communist" troops.

The killing championship is now with China, naturally one of the most peaceful countries on earth.

Mr. Irenee du Pont, munitions manufacturer, who knows about war, since he produces "the goods," tells the munitions committee "the only way to wage a war is to have an absolute monarch at the head of the government"; also "we shall have a h—l of a time in case of war."

No question about the last statement.

Mr. Baruch, entering whole-heartedly into the President's campaign to prevent profits for munitions makers in wartime, wisely urges preparation, says the country should buy and store thousands of tons of tin for use in the event of war. "I think we ought to buy tin just as we would invest in a battleship, and keep it in storage."

More Juice From Lemons

Lemon juice is a splendid flavoring for cakes as well as for beverages. Of course you want to get all the juice from them that you possibly can. You will find that you can extract a great deal more juice from a lemon if you place it in a fairly hot oven for five minutes before using.

Boat That Made History

The war vessel Monitor, built in 1861, was designed by Capt. John Ericsson, one of the inventors of the screw propeller. Its sides were protected by armor plate five inches thick and its turret by armor eight inches thick. Its queer appearance gave it the name, "the Yankee cheese box on a raft."

Little Girl's Face Inflamed by Psoriasis
Healed by Cuticura
"My little girl's face was so inflamed that her eyes were swollen almost shut. The trouble was diagnosed as psoriasis. She scratched night and day and was not able to obtain rest. The scratching aggravated the trouble and each finger tip was red and swollen with infection. She became so emaciated that she was very pathetic looking.
"After three months' suffering I recalled the Cuticura treatment used by my mother. I bought a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment and used them according to directions. GIVE HIM A FAIR TRIAL

Bruno Hauptmann, who went on trial yesterday for murder, is entitled to a fair trial under every safeguard guaranteed an accused person in our Anglo-Saxon law.

The vile crime of which he stands accused has stirred this country more deeply than any crime in recent years. But the courts must try him, not mass opinion.

There is in America a tendency that is menacing to order and law. This is a sort of hair-trigger justice that treats an accused person as a guilty one. For days now certain elements have been seeking to cr eate about Hauptmann an atmosphere of pre-judged guilt. Recently there was flashed on movie screens a series of pictures of the Hauptmann trial scene in New Jersey, and among the pictures was that of an electric chair! This sort of thing is abhorrent to law-loving Americans.

Guilty or innocent Hauptmann should be tried fairly. His trial must not be made a Roman holiday for sensation mongers and horror hawkers.

IS IT ALIVE

A committee of five members of the American Bar Association declares the Child Labor Amendment outlawed becaused 10 years have elapsed since it wa s submitted by Congress to the states.

Proponents of this humane measure need not be unduly alarmed. The argument is a familiar one. It is nothing but an opinion, and counsel quite as eminent as those of the committee and more numerous say there is nothing in it.

The U. S. Constitution itself sets no time limit for the ratification of its amendments. No limit is set in the Child Labor Amendment.

A similar question arose in 1921 in a prohibition case (Dillon vs. Gloss). Mr. Justice Van Devanter, speaking for a unanimous Supreme Court, ruled that ratification must take place "within some reasonable time after the proposal." He said, however, that the seven years set by the act came within the term reasonable. A "reasonable time," therefore, would be longer than seven years. Why would 10 years be unreasonable?

Of course unratified amendments can die. But no amendment appears to have maintained so much vitality over a decade as this one aimed at child labor. Hardly a year has passed without some action having been taken on it in one or both houses of some state legislature.
Farm Bureau Federation in reversing its previous stand and urging ratification, by reaffirmation of American Legion support, by new crusades launched by the American Federation of Labor, women's clubs and a score of national organizations.

That popular interest is astir is shown by the recent action of the American Farm Bureau in reversing its previous stand and urging ratification, by reaffirmation of American Legion support, by new crusades launched by the American Federation of Labor, women's clubs and a score of national organizations.

Recently President Roosevelt asked the states to ratified. Of the 44 legislatures meeting in the new year, 24 have not ratified, and only 16 of these are needed.

Doubtless these states will pay more attention to the President and the people than to a group of opposition lawyers.

Inversion

Inversion is a process, not an object or subject, says Literary Digest. It is such a turning as gives the opposite position or order. We invert the common or natural position of a thing by turning it upside down or upsetting it; hence that which is inverted is not, in most cases, in its right or normal condition. The term embraces the idea of wrong or disorderly position, arrangement, or sequence.

Strange Way to Eat

The acorn barnacle has been aptly described as an animal that rests on its head and kicks food into its mouth, says the American Nature association. They are familiar to every one who visits the seacoast as the hard sharp objects that cover the seaward side of rocks and boulders near high water mark.

THIS AND THAT

By
W. J. BALDWIN

An Alabamain who knows the man and what he stands for does not have to borrow on his imagination and enthusiasm to picture Governor-elect Bibb Graves as the ideal running mate for President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1936. Alabama's incoming executive possesses every qualification for the high office in Washington. And, furthermore, President Roosevelt is as much aware of that fact as any man in the United States. Col. Graves went straight to Roosevelt's private sanctums, in Washington and Warm Springs, when he had matters of importance to discuss with the President, and on each occasion the President was impressed with the Alabamain's knowledge of State and national affairs, and particularly impressed with his loyalty to the New Deal.

No other southern gentlemen is better qualified than Col. Graves to serve his country as its vice-president. No other American citizen is more American, more democratic, more profound in his New Deal ideas and thoughts, more diplomatic in his dealings with the other man, more worthy the high honor than Bibb Graves. And, above all else, Alabama deserves the honor and the nation needs Bibb Graves, especially at this time when President Roosevelt must surround himself with the best talent the country affords.

God needed an annex to Heaven, so He made Alabama.

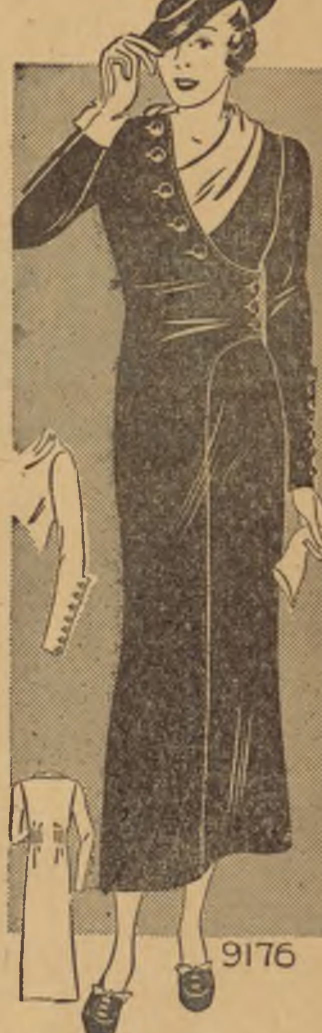
PATTERN 9176



Buttons emphasize every smart detail of this unusual dress with such slender lines. See the way they follow the surplice from the right shoulder, close it at the side, and strut half the way up the forearm of the sleeve. Tiny vertical tucks are used to mold the waistline at the back, giving extra ease to the bodice. Then, too, stitched seaming down the front of the skirt seems to take away inches from the hips. The irregular neckline is softened by a most becoming scarf. This design would be charming in black satin with a scarf of the queerly named, but very lovely, dirty pink color, or metal cloth.

Pattern 9176 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 requires 3⅜ yards 39 inch fabric and ½ yard contrasting.

Again at Crossroads

Washington.—Time after time since President Roosevelt entered the White House, many observers have insisted that he had reached a crossroads and that on those occasions he necessarily had to choose between the right and the left. They contended with considerable justification that he either had to be conservative or radical. But somehow the President arranged to follow both roads at once. At least that conclusion has been reached by those who classify themselves as liberals.

Now, observers are saying again that the President has reached the crossroads and must choose between the right and the left. With the convening of congress there has come forward the usual number—perhaps I should say more than the usual number—of proposals for radical or conservative legislation as the case may be. There are dozens, almost hundreds, of bills advocating nostrums and crackpot ideas which cannot possibly do more than take up time and keep the government printing office busy at the expense of the taxpayers in printing the bills themselves. There are in all of this mess as well many pieces of worthwhile legislation as well as the proposals bearing earmarks of drafting under White House guidance.

In addition there are close to six dozen presidential appointments upon which the senate must act. Some of these names are of individuals of known radical tendencies. Some others are recognized as equally conservative. It will be the senate's job to pass upon these nominations which, some observers insist, represent perhaps the widest variation in economic views that has ever been sent to the Capitol for confirmation of appointment.

As a corollary for this confused state, there are the growing differences of opinion, based on presidential policy proposals, as to whether the government should attempt to provide relief through work as Mr. Roosevelt desires or should turn to a plain, unadulterated dole. There is the demand from the White House for legislation putting the federal government further into competition with business by expansion of publicly owned power facilities and the question of liquidating or continuing to expand such programs as that of loans to home owners and extension of NRA.

Summed up, it would appear, superficially at least, that Mr. Roosevelt is definitely at the crossroads. I am told by legislative leaders, however, that the administration program thus far advanced again does not commit Mr. Roosevelt definitely to follow either the radical or conservative pathways. They point out that there is an unusual admixture of two schools of economic thought represented in legislation bearing presidential approval and their thought seemed to be that Mr. Roosevelt will avoid being forced into either camp at this time.

More Action Than Results?

It has been most interesting to observe the fluctuation of temperature among the various New Dealers. Prior to the last election they were very low in spirit. Many of them were saying, in private at least, that Mr. Roosevelt was getting out of hand as far as they were concerned and was turning certainly toward the conservative school of thought. At the same time among conservative members of the administration and in congress and to a considerable extent among business leaders, there was a growing feeling that they had witnessed the phenomena of having their own ears pinned back just when they thought they were on the upgrade.

Following this change of trends, along comes the mass of White House legislation, some of which pleases the New Dealers and some of which pleases the conservatives. Each finds fault with that portion of the program that is reasonably satisfactory to the other. This contrariety of opinion extends into the ranks of members of the house and senate. Consequently, the question to which the observers are now seeking an answer is whether Majority Leader Robinson in the senate and the Democratic wheel-horses in the house are going to be able to keep their tremendous numbers in line. Thus far, there has been no word from the majority leaders either in the house or the senate indicating any doubt on their part that the administration whip will fail to drive recalcitrant members into the proper alleys. Unbiased observers are taking the position, however, that time alone will tell. And it may be added with some emphasis that if the wild horses break loose from the hitching post once, the current session of congress may provide much more action than results.

Soldiers' Lobby Strong

Present plans of the Republican leadership, if there are enough Republicans left to make their presence felt, indicate that the Democratic commanders need not expect any help from that quarter in pulling hot chestnuts out of the fire. For example, I understand that the soldiers' bonus question will be used by the Republicans as a sort of prod with which to disturb the majority party. It seems definite that the house and senate will pass legislation for immediate payment of the bonus. It may not be a program for full payment of the sum that is not due until 1945, but the pressure is so strong that some action will be forthcoming.

If Mr. Roosevelt sticks to his guns and vetoes any bonus legislation excepting that proposing to care for the destitute ex-soldiers, sailors and marines, there is enough strength in congress to pass the legislation over his veto. The soldiers' lobby is strong; of that there can be no doubt. The members will be thinking of their political future, not Mr. Roosevelt's, when the question is put before them. Then is when the Republican minority could be of distinct help to the administration but, apparently, that is just the thing the Republican minority is not going to do.

The administration is now examining various avenues of a possible compromise on the bonus payments and it is through this course that a hope exists on the part of administration leaders to avoid the showdown mentioned above. Knowing that it cannot count on the Republican minority for any help to carry through its plans, the administration may make some concessions to the bonus advocates. These most certainly will be made unless a count of noses by the leadership shows a little later that the supporters of a full bonus payment can be whipped—and right now that is generally considered by observers as being impossible.

Here again the views of radicals and conservatives clash. There will be some radicals supporting the bonus payment in order to force the President into a position where he must inflate the currency further. That group thinks inflation of the currency will boost prices and provide the necessary hypodermic injection to get us out of the depression. Opposed to these are a considerable number of house and senate members who fear inflation and its results like they fear the poison fangs of a rattlesnake So, when the bonus question is joined as an issue it seems to me we will see an interesting exposition of how politics makes strange bedfellows.

Federal Loans to Cities

President Roosevelt is about to open up the federal treasury for loans to cities to provide funds for construction of municipal light and power plants. He has announced definitely that he favors this procedure and, therefore, in effect has invited cities to join the march on Washington for more federal loans.

The newest development in the administration program of loaning money here and there seems to have resulted in repercussions of a more important nature than objections voiced to other types of federal loans. Here in Washington considerable discussion has developed as to the wisdom of this policy and this has been followed by speculation as to the ultimate end of a program of this kind. Opinion throughout the country apparently has not been definitely crystallized yet but from all indications it appears we are due to hear much debate on the newest New Deal idea.

Objectors to the program of providing loans to cities for construction of municipal light and power plants insist that Mr. Roosevelt has taken the longest step toward state socialism thus far to be made a part of his New Deal. They contend that Mr. Roosevelt has gone beyond his recovery program and has embarked upon a plan representing part and parcel of his scheme for public ownership of all industries impressed with a public interest through service of a monopolistic character.

Opponents also argue that the President is placing privately owned industries under a severe handicap by forcing them to compete with what should be private industry but what actually is their own government.

In some quarters also I hear expressions of a fear that if any substantial number of cities borrow federal money to build their own light and power plants, the federal government will have expanded to that extent its domination over those cities. Through loans to banks, to agriculture and to many other lines, federal influence daily is being exerted upon the private life of the country until, some observers declare, states, counties and municipalities are gradually sinking into oblivion insofar as their own self-government is concerned.

On the other hand, such advocates of public ownership as Senator Norris of Nebraska, are elated over Mr. Roosevelt's decision to proceed along public ownership lines. Senator Norris believes Mr. Roosevelt has authority now under public works and recovery act provisions to promote publicly owned light and power plants about any place he pleases. The Nebraska senator, it will be remembered, was the spearhead of the movement that resulted in creation of the Tennessee Valley authority and the program for development of electrical energy from the Muscle Shoals dams in the Tennessee river. Already, privately owned light and power companies in many sections contiguous to the Tennessee river plant have been virtually forced to sell their properties to the TVA.

POULTRY

USE COLOR SCHEME TO SELECT LAYERS

Red-White-and-Blue Method Is Recommended.

Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.

A simple plan of selecting the best layers in a farm flock is described by H. L. Shrader, of the United States Department of Agriculture, as the red-white-and-blue method. It calls for the use of three colors of leg bands for marking three desirable characteristics of hens in the breeding flock.

The first culling date provides a check on all pullets that have begun to lay. These are the early-maturing pullets and are marked with red leg bands. It is easy to determine an early layer, as she has a deep-red comb and wattles and a moist vent. If the bird belongs to one of the yellow-skinned varieties she will show distinct bleaching around the vent and on the beak.

The next culling period affords an opportunity to check the rate at which the pullets have laid during the winter. Those that have laid steadily will have lost, through the egg yolks, most of the yellow coloring matter assimilated from yellow and green feed. But birds that have taken a vacation during the winter have some of this pigment, readily observable, in the beaks and shanks. All pullets with bleached beaks and shanks are marked with a white leg band.

The last period for culling comes after the hot weather has arrived. This is the time to detect the birds that take their vacation before they have finished their laying year. The molt is a good indication of the time these pullets have been out of laying. The bird with ragged, worn feathers may not look like a blue-ribbon winner compared with her sister that has clean, bright feathers. But the bird with the worn feathers deserves the blue leg band because she is a persistent layer and has kept up her production into the hot weather instead of molting a new crop of feathers. Leg bands are removed from birds that go broody.

The red-white-and-blue layers should be mated the next spring to males from flocks with trap-nest records that show heavy winter production of good-sized eggs of the proper color for the breed.

Heat for Poultry Houses Where Winter Is Severe

Heating poultry houses seems to be necessary, in very cold parts, if hens are to lay well in winter, says the Montreal Herald. The danger of fire makes great care essential. Attention to a few elementary principles will assure a maximum of safety and prevent very heavy losses.

First, the floor of the house and the stove should be level. This not only makes for less danger of oil leakage and better stove functioning, but also makes for keeping the litter level instead of piled up in the low spot which may be under the stove. Be sure the thermostat or wafer is in good shape and actually regulating the stove.

Place asbestos or sand, or both, under the stove. Be sure the sand is as deep or deeper than the litter, and scrape out any litter that works under the hover. Making sure that the sand is deep enough, and that the peat, crushed cobs or straw are not under the stove, should be a daily checking job.

The brooder house should always be placed far enough from the other buildings so that if the worst comes, it won't involve other farm buildings.

Lack of Mineral in Feed

Lameness in chickens may be the result of a lack of calcium in their food, which can be offset by feeding oyster shell, placing it before the birds in self-feeding hoppers; or, add about 5 per cent bone meal to their mash ration. Lameness may also be caused by intestinal parasites. The only way to relieve intestinal parasites in hens is to give them worm capsules and follow this up in about six to eight hours with a dose of Epsom salts. It may be necessary to repeat the dose in about ten to twelve weeks' time.—Montreal Herald.

Fattening Cockerels

The size of pen necessary to fatten 20 cockerels would be about 10 by 12 feet, providing the cockerels are from four to five pounds each. It is hard to tell how much it will cost to fatten the birds. Very much depends on one's ability as a feeder and the constitution and vigor of the cockerels. The pen should be light; there is no object in having it dark. The birds will do better where they can have considerable sunlight, providing they are in confinement and the pen ventilated.

Sanitary Poultry Houses

Sanitation means a lot to some poultrymen and not so much to others. We should use our common sense, declares a poultry expert at the North Carolina State college. Manure should not be allowed to accumulate on the dropping boards; litter should not become soggy and sour; drinking fountains should be cleaned once a day and sterilized once a week; clean nests should be the rule and the mash hoppers should be scraped out occasionally, especially in damp weather.

Many Ways of Winning Sought-For Popularity

A girl is popular for some one of many reasons, or by a combination of them. For example, a girl who is good at sports will find herself popular with those of similar tastes. She must be expert in some field. It may be tennis, golf, water sports, sailing a boat, skiing, etc., and she should be above the average in some of the other sports. It is worth while for a girl who enjoys out-of-door exercise to practice and perfect herself in her favorite sports so that she will be sought as a partner for games or a companion in sports. Her very ability at winning gives her prestige which makes her agreeably noticeable. If to this ability she adds a pleasant manner and is a good sport in losing, when she does, as every one must at times, she has gone a long way on the road to popularity.

Some girls are popular in their set because they have an accomplishment which makes them an addition to any gathering. Playing a musical instrument, singing, impersonating, being able to interest a group in an account of some event or in telling stories amusingly, in short, being a good raconteur—any of these things, when done in a way above the average, lends a certain enviable distinction to the person, and supplies them with popularity. It is assumed that there is also a polish of manner which gives a gracious and agreeable personality, without which few can expect to become favorites or be popular, whatever their field.

Being a good dancer is one of the drawing room accomplishments which makes a girl sought as a partner, and cut in for when already dancing. A help to this popularity is to have a happy expression. The one with whom the girl is dancing may get only brief glimpses of this, but those watching get full view and are apt to make mental note of expression. Another drawing room accomplishment is playing a good game of cards plus taking a beating without arguments. To haggle over cards played, to criticize your partner's leads or the way he failed to follow yours, is fatal to popularity.

Girls who are unpopular are apt to think harshly or even speak disparagingly of those who are popular. It is distressing to find one's self in the background, but one is wise to analyze the situation and find out why one loses out, before being too downcast or derogatory.

Learn to be good at something which makes for attraction. To be good looking isn't everything. To be made up too much is no help. To have a winning expression is a great aid. To be a good listener is another. This does not mean merely being silent and letting the other person talk. It means listening so that whatever comments you do make are to the point, revealing an understanding of the conversation. Try to make yourself popular in some field and in some way. If you do this with sincerity and not superficially you are in a fair way to win success.

Entomologists Tell Us Things About Mosquito

Fishermen have long known when fish bite best. Now the periods when mosquitoes bite best, or worst, have been revealed by entomologists of the United States Department of Agriculture.

There are mosquitoes that bite only at night, others that bite only during the day, some bite best at sunrise and some best at sundown.

There is one grain of comfort for the mosquito-ridden citizen. Only the female mosquito bites. The male feeds on nectar and similar substances.

Here are some mosquito "schedules:"

The "rain barrel" or common mosquito bites only at night and can find her victims no matter how dark it is. When flying it makes that irritating singing noise which is familiar to every one.

The yellow fever mosquito usually bites close to the ground or attacks from behind, and often crawls under clothing to bite. It bites only in the daytime and is busiest early in the morning and late in the afternoon. It flies quietly. It will bite indoors all day.

The fresh-water marsh mosquito known under the scientific name Mansonia, a severe biter, is busiest just at dusk. It spends the day in the grass and will bite during the day if disturbed.

Malarial mosquitoes will bite all night long and sometimes, too, in the daytime, especially on dark days.

Artificial Chlorophyl

Within a year scientists expect to be able artificially to create chlorophyl, the substance used by plants for transforming solar into chemical energy. Dr. Paul Rothemund, research fellow of Kettering Foundation of Antioch college, recently reported to the Academy of Sciences that synthetic production of this substance, the basis of plant life, appears to be only a matter of months.

men to organize in seeking better hunting and fishing.

Alabama was blest with good game crops and attracted some of th enation's foremost leaders in the field of conservation to its rich forests and wateways to see for themselves the wildlife resources for which this state is known Again the Bobwhite led all game birds and animals in popularity, but there was plenty of deer, duck, dove, turkey, bear and squirrel hunting.

Commissioner Quinn has announced that game farming and an expansion in fish culture are aims of the Game and Fisheries Department for the immediate future. During the last year streams in more than 60 counties were restocked with fish from state hatheries and a building program was undertaken that will greatly increase the output of these hatcheries.

The Tennessee Valley Authority is understood to be ready to develop the wildlife resources of the valley on a planned scale and hunting has been curtailed in the Alabama national forest in anticipation of the addition of some 300,000 acres to the present forest tract.

The Alabama deep sea fishing rodeo drew a record re-gistration of 525 angles who came from more than a dozen states to test their skill at deep sea fishing. With financial aid from the federal government, the Game and Fisheries Department was enabled to resume oyster planting in Mobile waters and a total of 41,000 barrels of oysters and shells were planted.

The first four months of the 1934-35 hunting season produced 15 hunting accidents, 10 of them proving fatal.

From The People

The past history of unionism in the U. S. prior to the New Deal could appropriately be written upon the skin and with the blood of those unsung heroes who gave all so this great cause might live. They were opposed by public opinion and a group of blood sucking capitalists. Thus begun that march upon the road of human progress, whereby not only the favorite few, but all could taste the fruits of a rich liife, built upon a foundation of social, political, and economic justice.

The early unions were feared as bands of outlaws, each intoxicated with the avowed purpose of desroying that which a glorious Democracy had toiled so nobly toward building. This public opinion was controlled and directed by a group of selfish capitalists who through our press and Government preached the gospil of rugged individulism. This gospil contended that the laboring class generally had enough to purchase a few clothes and a little food which was a just compensation for their contribution to industry. Therefore they have no right to organize whereby a better standard of living could be secured. We own the factory, we built them with our money and brains, have not we the right to work our labor and spend our profit as we please? So, long as industry hummed this gospel worked like magic. What chance had labor leaders to convince this group of capitalists that their only chance for a never ending prosperity lay in the fact that labor must have a more just share of the profits so consumption could keep pace with production.

Time rolled, union after union was broken, the majority of the people were clamoring the capitalists or God sent, we would stick with them, they will not fail us. Like a bolt out of the clear sky to some the great and well managed American businesses opened their doors one morning late in 1929 and found they did not have a customer and wondered why. The following months were dark, the masses were living on little bread and no hope. Complete chaos seemed inevitable, until in came a new deal guided with a man with different ideas from those sared capitaists. The forgotten man was to have a place in this new scheme. This forgotten man the laborer was the customer who had to come down that morning and the big-hearted capitalist had wondered why. This new man, our great President, officially gave this forgotten man the right to organize and bargain collectively with his employer, whereby, through co-operation justice could be exacted from otherwise impregnable doors.

Fellow union members the torch of unionism has been handed us with a new spirit and meaning. This torch must move forward. There is still main some pitfalls in our paths. A small portion of public opinion still considers us as a dangerous element. We must weed them out through interlectual leadership. Also we must develop greater unity within our own ranks. Again I repeat we must move forward fellow clerks, miners, carpenters, painters, farmes etc, with interlocked arms we must move that torch onward, until we can gaze back without shame upon the bones of our past leaders, then turn forward with a courgeous and smiling face and hand that torch to our posterity with the assurance that economic, political and social justice is theirs to noblely and proudly carry on.

The New Year was greeted with inspired enthusiasm by millions who didn't fear so well during the old year. The old year was not so bad; the trouble, to a large extent, was with us. The man who buckled down, held his chin up, smiled and went at his troubles in the right spirit and with the right punch didn't suffer so much. The pessimist who thinks the world owes him a living and should settle the account without any persuasion on the part of the debtor, is the one who grumbles about the times and who will grumble again when another year passes on.

MANY BANKS LONG LIVED

In the United States—
168 Banks over 100 years old.
2,472 Banks over 50 years old.
10,391 Banks over 25 years old.

There are in the United States 168 banks that have been in continuous existence for more than one hundred years. There are 2,472 banks over fifty years old, while 64% of all the banks in this country, or 10,391, are twenty-five years old or older.

In other words, practically two-thirds of the banks in this country have come through several successive periods of depression and panic, including 1907, 1914, 1920 and 1929-33.

The Oldest Bank

The oldest bank in the country, which is in Boston, was chartered February 17, 1784.

In the 64% of banks that are twenty-five years old or older is lodged a major portion of the banking resources of the nation. In commenting recently upon the stability of a great majority of the banks in the United States, Dr. Harold Stonier, Educational Director of the American Bankers Association, said:

"The fact that we have so many banks that have been in existence a long period of years is an eloquent tribute to the genius of American managerial ability, for no other country has experienced such wild gambling eras and resultant periods of business stagnation as those through which our country has passed at frequent intervals during the past century."

"The aggregate is an increase over last year of $742,132,000, the first since the year which closed June 30, 1930,' he says. "This is a notable achievement, for the decline since 1930 had been precipitate and all-embracing. In that year savings had reached the all-time high of $28,478,631,000. A year ago the amount was $21,[illegible],000, a loss in three years of $7,[illegible],000. This year the figure stands at [illegible]67,636,000.

PLAYWRITING CONTEST TO BE HELD AT COLLEGE

Two prizes and probable production by the Alabama College Theatre are the awards offered in the Fifth Playwriting Contest, announced by Dr. W. H. Trumbauer, director of the College Theatre, Montevallo. The closing date is February 15, while a decision in the contest is to be announced by April 15.

Subject matter is unrestricted but the use of Southern material is encouraged and eligibility is limit to residents of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississipi and Tennessee. The previous contests have brought entrants from several of these states each year.

Winners of the 1934 contest were Mrs. Joan Cameron Agnew, LaFayette, Alabama, with "Pillared Porticoes;" Miss Frances Turner, University of Alabama, with "I Maintain Its Comedy;" and Miss Clara Crenshaw, Greenville, Alabama, with "Maurice and Fleurette."

A number of plays entered in the contests have been produced at Alabama College. The prizes are $35 for the best full-length play, and $10 for the best short play. Manuscripts should be sent to Dr. Walter H. Trumbauer at Montevallo.

FARM OUTLOOK FOR 1935 IS BETTER

Greatly reduced supplies of most agricultural products with some improvement in consumer purchasing power conexpected to bring about a higher level of farm income during the first half of 1935 than during the first half of 1934, despite the continued low foreign demand for American farm products, according to the annual agricultural outlook report issued November 5 by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics at the conclusion of a week's conference with agricultural economists of 40 States, and of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Farm production larger than the unusually small production of 1934 is expected next year. The higher prices this year may tend to stimulate excessive planting of some crops in 1935 particularly where adjustment programs are not in effect. Continued improvement in demand late in the year will depend primarily upon recovery in the durable goods industries, where the decline in employment and production has been most pronounced.

A small imprvement in the purchasing power of farm families may, in general, be expected. In the areas severly affected by the drought, however, cash incomes during 1935 will be extremely low, at least until the crops are marketed.

Prices of commodities used in agricultural production probably will average somewhat higher than in 1934, at least until the middle of 1935. The credit situation will continue to show gradual improvement above the bad conditions of

FEDERAL AID NOT AVAILABLE FOR ALA. SCHOOLS

Montgomery, — No county or city school system in Alabama is eligible for Federal relief funds for December teachers' salaries, a preliminary investigation by the Alabama Relief Administration indicated today.

Thad Holt, ARA director, said a study of the financial conditions of the eight counties and three cities which had applied for December grants shows that none apparently has exhausted every other possible financial resource, as required by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration..

Preliminary investigations, Mr. Holt said, indicate that not only will the applicant counties and cities be able to pay their December salaries without aid, but many will be able to extend their terms into January without assistance.

The counties which have applied for December and January funds are Crenshaw, Escambia, Clarke, Choctaw, Chambers, Conecuh, Pickens and Winston. Cities which applied are Albertville,, Attalla and Fort Payne.

After a brief business meeting, the twelve members present celebrated Alabama Day in a program planned by Miss Alice Boyd. Much entertainment and information were provided by games, the principal one of which was a historical questionaire relating to historical facts about each member's native state.

Delicious refreshments were served at the social hour which followed the meeting.

P. T. A. TO MEET

The Montevallo P. T. A. will meet Tuesday January 16 at the Grammar School at 3:15 P. M.

LEGISLATURE ELECTS OFFICERS IN INITIAL SESSION THIS WEEK

Col. Bibb Graves will be inaugurated as the Governor of Alabama next Monday at Montgomery. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., will become the state's Lieutenant Governor.

The Legislature which convened this week, after organizing and hearing the retiring Governor's farewell message will probably mark time until the new executive is inducted into office at the capitol.

Rep. Harry Walker of Limestone County was elected Speaker of the House on the first ballot, while Senator Hardy Riddle was named President Pro Tem of the Senate. Mr. Walker is the first Speaker from North Alabama since the Brandon administration.

Governor Miller in his last message before the state's lawmakers devoted quite a deal of time in defense of the state's prohibition laws. He contended that in order to raise revenue from the sale of beer and liquor, it would necessitate the consumption of more alcohlic beverages, defeating the cause of temperance. It was regared as a material point for the dry forces in the state when a resolution passed, authorizing 5,000 copies of the governor's message to be printed. In addition to his prohibition remarks, Gov. Miller stressed the program of economy in government which has characterized his administration.

There are several major issues which will face the house and senate members before adjournment. The prohibition issue which has occupied the minds of most of the citizenry will come up for disposal, but in all probability no action will be taken other than to provide for a staetwide referendum on the matter.

The question of reappointment will be brought into the limelight, with a bill to this effect having already been introduced. The educational status of the state will come in for its share of attention with considerable influence being exerted from different quarters.

The matter of economy in government will no doubt occupy a major portion of the legislators' time. Gov.-elect Graves is a strong advocate of economy and has several measures to that end which will be brought before the law making body..

RUSSIAN CHORUS IS HEARD HERE WED.

The Slaviansky Russian Chorus, making its second American tour, was presented in Palmer Hall Wednesday night as the fifth number on the Concert and Lecture Series of Alabama College.

Mmme. Agreneva Slaviansky, one of the few internationally recognized women conductors,, brought this organization from Russia four years ago. Since then it has given more than a thousand programs in this country. Varied vocal combinations, and both Russian and Gypsy dances featured the unusual program.

Outstanding among the soloists were Mlle. Mara Slaviansky, daughter of the conductor and Ivan Butenko, who has been with the chorus for over 47 years.

TEA GIVEN AT COLLEGE THURS.

The Home Economics Department of Alabama College entertained a number of Montevallo residents at a tea in the home management house from 4 to 5 o'clock Thursday. At the Entertainment a "perfect lighting sysem" which was installed in the house by the Alabama Power Company for one day, was exhibited.

Students majoring in Home Economics and other Alabama College students who are interested in scientific lighting observed the exhibit earlier in the day.

The Alabama Power Company also presented a moving picture and several demonstrations lectures on scientific lighting, at several assemblies of students and faculty members Thursday.

DRY FORCES WILL MAKE CAMPAIGN

A state-wide speaking campaign in behalf of the retention of Alabama's bone-dry prohibition laws will be sponsored by the Alabama Temperance Alliance, H. L. Anderton, director of the campaign, announced today.

Beginning on January 15, Mr. Anderton said meetings would be held in every county in the state, and speakers would be furnsihed by the Alliance.

"We expect to wage a relentless campaign against the evils of alcohol until the curtain rings down on the proposed referendum," he said.

CIVIC CLUB WILL MEET WEDNESDAY

The regular meeting of the Montevallo Civic Club will be held next Wednesday at 12:15 at the Methodist Church. All members are urged to be present.

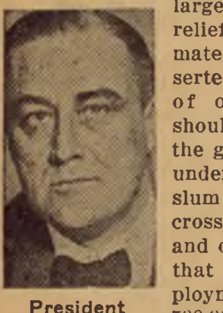
President Roosevelt Tells Congress of his Great Work Relief Plan—Designed to Supplant the Downright Dole.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.



President Roosevelt

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT in his message to congress, delivered in person at a joint session, offered the law-makers a "new and greatly enlarged plan" of work relief. He did not estimate its cost, but asserted that the system of outright doles should be dropped and the government should undertake projects of slum clearance, grade crossing elimination and other public works that would give employment to about 3,500,000 persons now without jobs. The figures to be proposed for this were reserved for his budget message, but he assured congress that they would be "within the sound credit of the government."

Mr. Roosevelt declared the gains made in the year 1934 were greater than the losses and expressed "a strong hope in the coming year." He reasserted his belief in the "profit motive" but uttered a warning against wealth "which, through excessive profits, creates undue private power over private affairs, and, to our misfortune, over public affairs as well." This, naturally, was taken as applying especially to the public service interests, which have been so apprehensive of the administration's intentions.

As for a legislative program, the President made no attempt to outline one, but he did promise that definite legislation soon would be proposed covering old age and unemployment insurance, benefits for children and mothers, and other features of his social security plans.

He declared the nation was making headway toward the "new order," but under the framework of the Constitution, and he spoke of the increased industrial activity, benefits to agriculture and profits to merchants that have been realized. Then came this stern warning:

"Let him who, for speculative profit or partisan purpose, without just warrant would seek to disturb or dispel this assurance, take heed before he assumes responsibility for any act which slows our onward steps."

The President reported an unsettled condition in the foreign field, with the resurrection of old jealousies and passions and new strivings for armament and power in more than one land, adding:

"There is no ground for apprehension that our relations with any nation will be otherwise than peaceful."

Discussing the matters that will be brought before congress for action, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"Among the subjects that lie immediately before us are the consolidation of federal regulatory administration over all forms of transportation, the renewal and clarification of the general purposes of the national industrial recovery act, the strengthening of our facilities for the prevention, detection and treatment of crime and criminals, the restoration of sound conditions in the public utilities field through abolition of the evil features of holding companies, the gradual tapering off of the emergency credit activities of government, and improvement in our taxation forms and methods.

"We have already begun to feel the bracing effect upon our economic system of a restored agriculture.

"The hundreds of millions of additional income that farmers are receiving is finding its way into the channels of trade.

"The farmers' share of the national income is slowly rising. The economic facts justify the widespread opinion of those engaged in agriculture that our provision for maintaining a balanced production gave at this time the most adequate remedy for an old and vexing problem.

"For the present and especially in view of abnormal world conditions, agricultural adjustment with certain necessary improvements in methods should continue."

THE Seventy-fourth congress, elected on the sole issue of support of the New Deal, began its first session on the dot and devoted its first day to the organization of the two houses and the swearing in of new members. The lawmakers assembled in the Capitol were a serious looking lot, and with reason, for they have on their hands a big job, that of making the New Deal permanent; and in the doing of it they must solve some of the most perplexing problems that our national legislators ever have faced. It would seem that the Democrats will have no trouble in passing any legislation they wish, for they have an overpowering majority. In the senate are 69 Democrats and only 25 Republicans, plus one Progressive—Robert M. LaFollette—and one Farmer-Laborite — Henrik Shipstead. The house is comprised of 322 Democrats, 102 Republicans, seven Progressives and three Farmer-Laborites. The administration Democrats do not anticipate any trouble from the Republicans; it is from the radical members of their own party that their woes are likely to come, and the help of the Republicans may be necessary to curb those left wingers. The majority leaders in both houses can be counted on to hold the radicals under a tight rein if that is possible.

Speaker Byrns

In the speaker's chair sits Joseph T. Byrns, chosen unanimously by his fellow Democrats. He is too much of a compromiser to suit many of them, but is now tied to the administration, which declined to oppose his election. John H. Bankhead of Alabama, like Byrns one of the old school, won the leadership of the house after a brief struggle. Senator Joseph Robinson of Arkansas was re-elected majority leader of the senate, and Senator Lewis of Illinois continues as whip.

In their pre-session caucus the Democrats voted to reduce materially the Republican representation on house committees, and decided to abrogate the 145 rule for discharging a committee and bringing a bill to vote within a week. The number now required for this action is 218. This latter action will provide another restriction on the radicals.

TWO thousand eight hundred bills were introduced and referred to committees on the first day of the new congress. Number 1, handed in by Representative Wright Patman of Texas, provides for the payment of the adjusted service certificates of veterans immediately in cash, through the issuance of greenbacks. Patman and other supporters of this plan call it "controlled inflation."

Lemke of North Dakota, Republican, introduced a measure for the liquidation and re-financing of agricultural indebtedness. The liquidation would be carried out at a reduced rate of interest, according to the bill, by establishing an efficient credit system, through the use of the federal farm loan and federal reserve banking systems. Lemke also provided for the creation of a board of agriculture to supervise the program.

Continuance of the HOLC was proposed by several congressmen. The bond issue of this agency would be increased anywhere from one billion to four and a half billion dollars in the various bills introduced on the subject.

A 100 per cent payoff for depositors whose funds are tied up in trust companies was sought in two bills written by Representative Clarence J. McLeod of Michigan.

Many bills were introduced providing unemployment and old age insurance.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT did not wait for the opening of congress to start his fight against immediate payment of the veterans' bonus. The commander of a Legion post in Texas wrote him for information on the matter and Mr. Roosevelt replied at length, detailing his reasons for opposing the payment. He argued that the obligation is not immediately due; that of 3,500'000 certificates outstanding, 3,038,500 veterans have borrowed $1,690,000,000, or "more than the present worth of their bonus certificates," and that when the veterans borrowed 50 per cent of the face value of the certificates in 1931 they used the funds to discharge their debts.

This last point, according to National Commander Belgrano of the American Legion, is one of the strongest arguments for immediate payment of the adjusted service certificates.

"The foundation of good business is good credit," said Commander Belgrano. "The money due veterans would be used to satisfy bills at the corner grocery, would help pay rents that are long past due and would go to hard pressed merchants to discharge the accounts of harder pressed veterans."

Speaker Byrns admitted that the cash bonus bill would pass the house "because there is no opposition to it there," but he added that if the measure is finally enacted the administration will insist on some additional taxation to meet the estimated $2,000,000,000 expenditure. It is believed the senate also will pass the bill, but leaders doubt its passage by congress over the Presidential veto.

IF LOUISIANA wants any more public works money from the administration, it must "clarify" some of the new laws which its legislature has passed at the behest of Senator Huey P. Long. This is the gist of a letter sent to Gov. O. K. Allen by President Roosevelt, and the "kingfish" is not pleased by it. He told the reporters he would make his reply on the floor of the senate at the first opportunity. The President's warning applied especially to the Louisiana moratorium law passed in November. Since its enactment the PWA has held up payments on about 60 Louisiana projects.

Senator Vandenberg

SENATOR VANDENBERG of Michigan, liberal Republican, says he will introduce in the senate a bill designed to take the Post Office department out of politics. The measure he has drafted would put all postmasters and postal officials, except the postmaster general, under the civil service, and in the giving out of jobs the post office employees would have the preference. Senator Vandenberg has been persistently demanding that Postmaster General Farley either resign from the cabinet or give up his chairmanship of the Democratic national committee. In line with this his bill would prohibit the postmaster general from holding any political office.

By taking politics out of the department and establishing a career service, Vandenberg said, "the pavement-pounding letter carriers may look forward to ultimate graduation to the high post of first assistant postmaster general."

"Under this bill," he added, "politics and postal affairs at last are separated as far as is possible in a democracy. All local postmasters are put squarely under civil service with emphatic and effective priorities given to the 'postal grays' themselves.

"Existing postmasters are permitted to serve out their present commissions. Thereupon the vacancies are filled by promotion from the service ranks. Only in the event that no such person is available—and we anticipate that this contingency would not arise other than in some of the smallest offices—can the vacancy be filled otherwise than by promotion."

ONE of the most serious issues that will confront congress is the battle between business and industry on one side and organized labor on the other, especially over the thirty-hour work week. The American Federation of Labor is committed to this proposition, and to the retention of the collective bargaining provisions of the NRA act. Big business, as represented by the Chamber of Comerce of the United States and the National Manufacturers' association, is opposed to the thirty-hour week, and now has the support from the Brookings institution. It also seeks the separation of labor bargaining and practice codes in the reorganization of the NRA. The opening shot in this battle is the introduction by Senator Hugo L. Black of Alabama of his thirty-hour work week bill, which at present has not the support of the administration.

DEMOCRATS of Rhode Island surprised themselves and everyone else by gaining control of both houses of the state general assembly when a senate committee recounted the ballots from Portsmouth and South Kingston and declared two Democrats had been elected to the senate instead of the two Republicans who had been certified as winners by the state returning board. The Democratic legislators immediately organized the assembly, ousted the supreme court members, abolished the state appointed board of public safety and passed a reorganization bill to consolidate more than 80 agencies into 11 state departments.

FOREIGN MINISTER PIERRE LAVAL is carrying out successfully the work begun by his murdered predecessor, Barthou, to bring France and Italy into friendly accord for the settlement of all the conflicts that have arisen between those nations since the World war. The agreement, it is believed, will also insure peace in the Balkans. After a week of lively negotiations it was announced that M. Laval would go to Rome "to have important conversations with Premier Mussolini on questions which interest the two countries and on international politics and to conclude conversations which have been going on between the two countries."

WITH remarkable celerity the jury in the Hauptmann trial was selected, consisting of eight men and four women, and Attorney General Wilentz set forth the state's case against the Bronx carpenter who is accused of kidnaping and murdering the baby son of Colonel Lindbergh. The colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh were present, and they and Betty Gow, the child's nurse, were among the early witnesses. On behalf of the state the attorney general demanded the penalty of first degree murder.

IN 1933 the James E. Sullivan memorial trophy, awarded to the athlete contributing the most to the cause of amateur athletics during the year, was missed by Bill Bonthron of Princeton by just one vote and was given to Glenn Cunningham. Now it is in Bill's possession as the result of his great foot-racing campaign during 1934, in the course of which he established a world record for 1,500 meters and beat Cunningham in three out of five races.

In the nationwide ballot, conducted by A. A. U., Bonthron led in the preliminary voting and then piled up 1,072 votes in the final test after the field had been cut to seven. Benjamin B. Eastman, former Stanford track star, ran second with 929 and then came Ralph Metcalfe, Marquette university's negro sprinter, with 413, and Glen Hardin, Louisiana State university, with 285.

A Long Swim
Money Flows West
$5 for $3.39
Not So Barren

The new year, 1935, latest contribution of Father Time to the long chain of beads called "eternity," is here, and we are in it.

We shall continue to read opinions and rumors, plans and criticism of plans, in our slow progress to prosperity's shore. It is a long swim when you are thrown overboard in the middle of Lake Superior. This country was thrown overboard in another lake of superior prosperity and unlimited expectations back in 1929.

Farmers, newspapers devoted to the farmers' interest, big bankers of the East, are interested in the fact that the money tide that for so long flowed from producers in the West to accumulators in the East, is now flowing in the other direction.

The money tide goes out toward the farms of wheat raisers and stock, in the West and Middle West, and to the cotton farmers in the South. It is as though the Great Lakes had been tilted upward at the eastern end, and the waters sent rushing toward the Rocky mountains.

The tide will not flow long in that western direction, probably. Men that have the mortgages and collect the interest accumulate the money, in the long run.

Long ago, a man wagered that he would stand on London bridge offering genuine gold sovereigns for a shilling each and find few takers. The gold sovereigns were genuine, but nobody would buy. Mel Smith, a circus official called "Lucky" Smith, bet that Los Angeles citizens would refuse to buy genuine $5 bills for $3.39. Hundreds walked by, looked at the genuine bills. Some cried "Fake!" Only two purchased. "Lucky" Smith won a $100 wager.

Many Americans wish they had been as skeptical about certain stock back in 1929.

The distinguished George W. Russell of Ireland, who signs his writings "AE," says, "I am always struck by the terrible barrenness of rural life in America." He thinks we must "find some way to enrich it," and if we don't, "then the disease which destroyed ancient Italy will eat into America. You will no longer feed yourselves, and you will be struck with palsy of bread and circuses."

Mr. Russell may find greater richness in Irish farmhouses, but it is a richness of the character and of the mind, not of surroundings. There is little barrenness about, other than intellectual, in our rural life with its automobile, radio, moving pictures within easy reach, rural delivery, porcelain bath tubs, mail order catalogues, prayer meetings, revivals, annual circus, the public library, soon reached by automobile.

Next summer our ships of war, "venturing almost to Oriental waters," will engage in far-flung war games covering more than 5,000,000 square miles of the Pacific ocean.

How interesting that will be, and how rapidly those ships would come running home to hide away in port if a few large bombing planes should sail out from Asia, from Tokyo or Russia's Vladivostok, over those 5,000,000 square miles of the Pacific, and drop explosive bombs and poison gas bombs on the battleships!

Geological explorers from the Byrd expedition, near the South pole, report important veins of mineral quartz, discovered in mountains along the coast of Marie Byrd Land.

If the geologists should bring back actual samples rich in gold, how quickly men would find a way to reach those mountains, how indifferent to death they would be in the effort to get there!

We have piled up in Washington already $8,000,000,000 worth of gold. What would happen if Byrd should discover a mountain containing $1,000,000,000,000 in gold? That would be overdoing it, for instantly our $8,000,000,000 in gold would shrink in value to almost nothing, and the gold metal would be only metal, not precious.

In Kansas a terrific dust storm, hiding the sun, suggests that the Agricultural department help farmers by developing some temporary covercrop that could be sown on wheat and corn fields when the crops come off, a nitrogen-fixing plant if possible. It would protect dusty surfaces from high winds and be plowed under, contributing humus, before the next planting.

In the Northwest, farmers have used the "duckfoot" cultivator, which cuts a path 60 feet wide, going through the roots of weeds and not destroying the protection of the stubble from wind and the washing of heavy rains.

A wise motto of earlier days was: "When in doubt, refrain."

In Russia and other countries where the will of one takes the place of slow decisions by the majority, the maxim reads:

"When in doubt, shoot."

Moscow reports 14 more executed to avenge the killing of Sergei Kirov, making 117 lives taken to expiate that one murder.

GOOD MALES BRING HIGH-LAYING HENS

Use Progeny Testing Plan to Pick Best Sires.

Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.

A good male is ten times as important as a good hen in building up a flock of poultry. For this reason progeny testing, a method which enables a poultry breeder to identify the superior males in his flock, is a necessity to progress in poultry breeding, says Dr. M. A. Jull, in charge of poultry investigations for the United States Department of Agriculture.

Too much significance has been attached to phenomenal records in egg-laying contests, according to Doctor Jull, who bases his statement on the results of a recent experiment with White Leghorns and Rhode Island Reds at the Beltsville research center of the department, at Beltsville, Md. High-production records in the ancestry of hens used in a breeding flock are, of course, desirable but the experiment shows that such records on only one side of the ancestry are not sufficient assurance of high-producing pullets. On the other hand, three generations of good egg-production records do give some assurance of good records of the pullets.

A hen that produces good laying pullets by one sire may produce pullets with much lower averages when mated to another sire the next year. This indicates that a hen's value as a breeder is not always shown by the average egg production of her daughters but depends also on the mating involved. The ability to select superior breeding males is of great importance because a sire's influence on a flock is at least ten times as great as that of a hen, as one sire is usually mated to ten or more hens. The index of greatest value in determining a sire's breeding worth was found to be the average egg production of all of his daughters.

Italy Believed Home of Original Leghorn Fowls

The history of poultry reveals that "Italy was, undoubtedly, the home of the original Leghorn fowls," says the Montreal Herald. Early literature shows that poultry of several kinds was bred at least 3,000 years ago, and fowls were used in Rome for food 2,000 years ago.

Indications resulting from careful and widespread investigations, are that "The Leghorn fowls as they existed in Italy prior to 1815 were a mongrel lot," descended from promiscuous matings, without any attention being paid to color, body formation or productivity. The greatest development in the breed has taken place in England, the United States and Canada and it is significant that the high state of development attained in these countries has led breeders in the native home of the Leghorn to import specimens for the sole purpose of improving size, stamina, conformation and productivity—not to say profit.

Poultry Rations

Many poultry feed experts think it is a wise practice to build all poultry rations around yellow corn, believing that under normal conditions it may make up one-half to two-thirds of the grain mixture, depending on the season of the year, possibly more being required in the winter season than in summer. Wheat is well liked by fowls and may form a part of every ration. In feeding value it is said to be approximately equal to corn, pound for pound. When it is low in price it may be fed up to one-half the total grain allowance and when relatively expensive, it may be reduced to a fifth or even less, according to the Illinois Experimental station.

One hundred pullets should eat about 25 pounds of feed daily. The proportion of grain to mash will vary.

Systematic and continuous culling of poultry brings results quicker than almost any other piece of work on the farm.

Hens that are fed a small amount of cod-liver oil, about 2 per cent of their ration, produce eggs containing more copper and iron.

An inexpensive piece of galvanized sheet iron has been found to be a satisfactory covering for henhouse dropping boards. It is vermin-proof and easily cleaned.

Watchful Waiting

Washington.—It will be remembered that prior to America's entrance into the World war, the then President Woodrow Wilson pursued an announced policy of "watchful waiting." Mr. Wilson justified that policy on the high plane of a love for peace and the country supported him in that decision.

We are seeing a simulation of that course at present although the country is at peace and not at war. The policy of watchful waiting, adopted by President Roosevelt, has reference not to international relations but to domestic affairs. To be specific, it relates solely to the political situation in the new congress. The President is confronted, as everyone knows, with a huge bloc of extremely radical members in the house and senate and he has his hands full in compelling the congress to rubber stamp administration legislation.

Recent developments, White House pronouncements and other straws tending to show which way the wind blows indicate definitely that Mr. Roosevelt is going to avoid open clashes as far as possible. He is not going to test the mettle of the radical group too far without being sure of his ground.

Therefore, we may expect to see considerable delay in enactment of new banking legislation and in dealing with highly controversial questions centering in section 7 (a) of the national recovery act. Likewise, there will be hesitancy on the part of the administration to push forward a program of revision for the Agricultural adjustment administration and the policy of waiting may be expected to be disclosed in some other phases of legislation such as the unemployment insurance scheme.

I do not mean to convey the impression that there will be an entire absence of bills—some of them already are in the congressional hopper—dealing with these various questions. But definitely, it can be said at this time that the White House is watching congressional developments to determine just how far to the radical side it must go in order to avoid a wide open split between the ultra-radicals and the New Deal contingent. Just where the conservatives will figure in this picture is yet too early to determine except that certainly they can prove themselves to be thorns in the sides of the Democratic leaders at most inopportune times.

Toughest of Questions

To better indicate problems confronting the President with respect to his relationship with congress, it is necessary only to call attention to that most controversial of all questions—section 7 (a) of the recovery act. This provision has had numerous interpretations placed upon it and its effect generally has been to assist the international unions in strengthening their organizations throughout American industry. Section 7 (a) specifies, in effect, that the union in any factory having the most votes speaks for all of the employees in their dealings with the plant management. This provision is what the American Federation of Labor describes as collective bargaining. It has resulted in many cases in disruption of the so-called company unions, organizations having no affiliation with any other union but usually fostered by the corporation of which the workers are employees.

The consensus among unbiased observers here seems to be that the Federation of Labor overplayed its hand last winter in enforcing such a far-reaching interpretation of section 7 (a) as to give the larger union the voice of all employees. At that time NRA, with Donald R. Richberg guiding the policy, committed itself definitely in favor of such a construction. Current developments are generally accepted as showing that either the NRA administration or union labor failed to look far enough into the future to foresee the reaction that is now taking place.

As a matter of fact, tremendous pressure is being exerted on individual members of the house and senate for a revision of this section, and something will come of it before congress adjourns. Of course, when union labor acts in concert, it usually turns the gizzards of politicians very white from fear, but in the present instance, the politicians are torn between the devil and the deep blue sea.

Industrialists after all, are the boys who usually contribute to campaign funds. The politicians do not dare ignore that segment of political strength, either. Consequently, it is apparent now that there will be an attempt to rewrite section 7 (a) in a manner that will eliminate its ambiguities and take away from Mr. Richberg, now the policy director of NRA, the authority to do so much interpreting.

Another Problem

At the same time, the President has a problem of some consequence on his hands in the AAA. Chester Davis, the administrator, is generally regarded among Washington observers as a man with both feet on the ground. Such is not their view, however, with respect to some of the other individuals in the department.

Take H. R. Tolley, for example. Mr. Tolley has the title of director of planning for the Agricultural Adjustment administration. His relationship with Mr. Davis is almost identical with that between Undersecretary Rexford Guy Tugwell and Secretary Wallace of the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Davis is known to lean upon Mr. Tolley, but Tolley and Professor Tugwell do not always see eye to eye. So there is a personnel problem that may or may not become acute.

But as regards the congressional situation Mr. Tolley carries much more water on his shoulders than does Professor Tugwell. Readers will recall efforts made in the last session of congress to "strengthen" the agricultural adjustment act. Professor Tugwell supported those amendments and, having his head out of water, he became the target. Actually, the best information available is that while the voice was that of Tugwell, the hand was the hand of Tolley.

The common gossip now is that Mr. Tolley is presenting, rather preparing, proposals for "strengthening" the act and that he has not taken Mr. Tugwell into his plans. This being true, the suggestion is frequently heard that Mr. Tolley may commit the administration in certain directions toward regimentation of the farmers to an extent which Mr. Roosevelt does not desire to go.

Mr. Tolley is said to favor inclusion of the fruit and berry and specialty crops under federal control. This is believed to come from his California background, but regardless of its root it must be admitted its sponsor is making headway with the plans.

None can tell, however, until the details of the Tolley program are out in the open exactly what congressional reaction will be. Suffice it to say at this time that there are numerous Democrats, important Democrats at that, who do not go along with Tolley or with Tugwell, and the prediction is frequently made that Tolley's name may receive treatment as rough in congressional debate as did the name of Professor Tugwell last winter.

Banking Legislation

With respect to banking legislation radicals and conservatives likewise are at each other's throats, only this fight has become bitter already. Governor Eccles of the Federal Reserve board has been made the target of a vicious attack by Senator Glass of Virginia, recognized everywhere as the outstanding financial authority among Democrats at the Capitol. Senator Glass openly charged Governor Eccles with exceeding his authority in a recent ruling requiring state banks that are not members of the Federal Reserve board to reduce their interest rate paid on time and savings deposits. These banks were reached through the Federal Deposit Insurance corporation of which they are members and with whose regulations they must comply. The Virginia senator holds that the Federal Reserve board under the guidance of Governor Eccles was responsible for this action and he was not careful in tearing off the bark in a letter stating his views. Senator Glass has forced a temporary halt in the order.

While the Eccles-Glass row may be regarded as purely a controversy between two individuals in positions of high authority, it is much more than that. It presages trouble on any banking legislation that goes farther afield than has occurred heretofore because Senator Glass is an unequivocal fighter for retention of the independence of the Federal Reserve system from treasury domination.

It is not difficult to see why Senator Glass fears such policy as the interest rate reduction. He thinks that the Federal Deposit Insurance corporation already has been figuratively swallowed by the treasury and he believes that the administration also desires the treasury to swallow the Federal Reserve board. The next logical step if the latter is accomplished, is for the treasury to seek establishment of a central bank where the currency would be under control of politicians instead of responsive to business needs as it is now with the twelve regional Federal Reserve banks in operation.

Radical Bills

Too much attention should not be paid, in the opinion of astute observers here, to the mass of radical bills now flowing through the routine channels of introduction and reference to committees. Some of them, it is true, will become the basis of legislation later on but every house member or senator with an idea drafts it into the form of a bill and presents it in order that at sometime or other his name may be attached to the legislation. But it must be remembered that with the radical strength existing in both houses of congress some of these bills may get further through the legislative mill than they ordinarily would reach. This fact apparently justifies Mr. Roosevelt's waiting policy. But at the same time, I hear, it is subjecting the administration to a fresh outburst of criticism among that segment of the population which would like to know what the administration policy is.

THE CABIN

By R. H. WILKINSON

©, Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

THE cabin was located in a grove of evergreens. High flung mountain peaks surrounded it, hemmed it in.

A tiny river ran through the grove and from its banks a path wound up to the cabin's front door, 50 yards distant.

There were two men with him, Gene Lameraux, the half-breed trapper, who had brought news of Mitchell's death, and Dr. Nathan Irving, connected with the police in a medical capacity.

The cabin was a single room affair. There was a cook stove, a bunk built into the wall, a home-made table, a chair, three empty soap boxes, shelves lined with provisions, a lamp and a litter of Mitchell's personal effects.

Mitchell lay on the floor, face upward, near the cook stove.

The chair was close by, and it appeared as if the man had been sitting down when the thing happened.

Doctor Irving knelt beside the still figure and bent over it.

Leonard and the half-breed stood by, watching, awaiting the verdict.

"Been dead five, maybe six, hours. I'd say poison. Possibly strychnine. Whatever it was, the effect was instantaneous."

Constable Leonard bestirred himself. "Poor devil. Always liked the old man. He must have been pretty well depressed, yet you can't blame him. He's been prospecting around the north country for better than 20 years, and never made a strike. He always had faith that some time his efforts would be rewarded. Can't blame him for giving up. Discouraging business."

The officer turned and began browsing about the cabin.

On the opposite side of the room he picked up a glass, smelled of it, screwed up his nose at the unfamiliar odor, and returned to the doctor.

Lameraux, the half-breed, had sat down on a soap box, and when the policeman strolled outside the cabin, he followed.

They walked down the path and turned into a well-beaten trail that paralleled the river.

There was a crude cradle and a pan; a roughly built sluiceway, with a small heap of sand nearby.

Leonard examined the things closely, at last stooping to scrutinize the imprint of a man's boot in the soft earth.

The imprint was one of many, but a peculiar marking on the head of it, made perhaps by a design of protruding nails, distinguished it from the rest.

Leonard looked for and found more of the imprints, compared them with the others that were about.

Presently Lameraux, who had been watching the operations, laughed.

"There ess nothing strange about zee imprint, M'sieu, I made it myself, early this morning."

"You?" Leonard looked up in faint surprise.

The half-breed nodded.

"I came along thees way when approaching the cabin. Mitchell was not here, and I examined zee sluice."

"I see," Leonard nodded abstractedly, and turned back along the trail. Lameraux followed. At the point where the two paths joined, the policeman halted and swung about, as if a sudden thought had occurred to him.

"Was Mitchell dead when you entered the cabin?" he asked.

Lameraux spread his hands.

"I have already told you. He was lying on the floor. I spoke to him, but he did not answer. After a moment I realized something was wrong. I went on to the post for to get zee doctor an notify zee police."

Leonard nodded, abruptly changing the subject.

"Have any luck with your traps last winter, Gene?"

The half-breed beamed.

"Zee wonderful luck. Zee bon Dieu was kind. Three black foxes were among the catch."

"Where did you sell the furs?"

"At the Hudson Bay post near Little Water. Zee price was poor, but Gene ees plenty satisfied."

Leonard turned and started up the trail.

Doctor Irving was just emerging into the sunlight.

"Could you make out what kind of poison it was, Nat?"

Leonard sat down on the washbench near the door, his back to the wall, his hand resting carelessly near the service pistol at his waist.

The doctor was lighting a cigarette. "May not be strychnine, but something equally as powerful."

"And something that would effect an instantaneous death?"

"Yes."

"You're positive on that point?"

"Absolutely."

Leonard seemed to consider, and Doctor Irving said:

"It never seemed to me that Mitchell was the sort of guy who'd kill himself, despite his rotten luck."

He shrugged.

"We'd better be moving along, in order to get to town before dark. Shall I carry the body down to the canoe?"

"No. Let Lameraux do it."

The half-breed's eyes opened wide in an expression of amazement.

"But m'sieu, I have no taste for such a task. Besides, I am late now. I must go on to reach Little Water in two days' journey."

"Oh, so you're going back right away, eh? Not staying with us long. You must like to walk, mister. Come down for the exercise, did you?"

Lameraux's eyes were smoldering.

He fought to keep control of his nerves. Irving leaned against the door jamb, watched covertly, sucked on his cigarette.

He seemed to sense what was about to happen, and was prepared to lend a hand.

At the same instant Lameraux flung himself forward.

A knife glinted in the sunlight.

Irving sprang from his position near the door and sent the half-breed crashing to the ground, himself sprawling across the prostrate man's legs.

Leonard stood up, glancing at the torn place in his jacket where the knife had ripped the cloth of a sleeve.

He balanced the pistol in his hand.

"Thanks, Doc."

He spoke harshly to Lameraux. "Get up and turn around, with your hands behind you."

He issued the customary challenge and reached under his jacket for the handcuffs that dangled there.

"You should have kept up your bluff, mister; if it hadn't been for the glass you might have got away with it."

Leonard nodded.

"To begin with Old Mitchell made his strike and was working the claim. Any fool could have seen that. Lameraux must have come along, talked with the old boy and then gone up to the cabin with him for breakfast. Somehow or other the breed poisoned Mitchell's food, then cleaned up the breakfast dishes, dumped the corpse where we found it, and poured a little of the same poison on the table, in order to make it look like suicide.

"But Lameraux apparently didn't know or figure on the instant effect the poison would have. For if Mitchell had died the moment the poison got into his system, he couldn't have walked from the table, where he supposedly fell out of the chair dead."

Universe Is Not So Big, the Astronomers Declare

The go-getting spirit of America, "big, bigger, biggest," received a setback at the hands of science when it was determined that the galaxy of stars, of which the earth was just a minor member, wasn't nearly as large as had heretofore been thought—not by 75 per cent, says a United Press writer.

In viewing the universe around us through powerful telescopes, astronomers for years have puzzled at the extraordinary size of our own galaxy. It just didn't fit into their reasoned ideas about space and its occupants.

Now it has been determined that somewhere in space is a layer, or belt of known properties, which has the power to absorb light rays. Perhaps it is the Milky Way which absorbs this light, as Dr. Joel Stebbins, of the University of Wisconsin suggests.

At any rate, science has determined that light rays from distant stars are absorbed before reaching the earth—75 per cent, in fact.

This, according to Dr. W. Baade, of Mt. Wilson observatory, means that stars in our own galaxy, which appeared to be thousands of light years away, really are only one-quarter as distant as they appear.

Too, stars of far-distant island universes are closer to the earth than we previously believed.

Within the next few months an improved type of "thermionic tube" will be installed at the 100-inch telescope on Mt. Wilson. This apparatus will help immeasurably in measuring the brightness and color of stars and the giant nebulae lying billions of miles away from the earth.

This instrument will increase the useful measures of the light of nebulae from the thirteenth magnitude to the fifteenth magnitude. In other words, it will be possible to measure the size and distance of island universes which are nearly 50,000,000 light years from the earth. The present limit is about 25,000,000 light years.

Tree Transplantation

The best method for transplanting elms and oaks depends a good deal on the size of the plants moved. Oaks have very deep roots which makes large oaks hard to move. If an elm is over a foot or two tall, writes E. G. Cheyney, of the Minnesota division of forestry, it is impossible to get all the roots, but as many of the roots should be kept as possible. It is advisable to trim back the tops proportionately. Elms over 3 inches in diameter should be moved in the winter with a ball of dirt.

Wealth of a Nation

The wealth of a nation is and must always consist in the power of individual human beings to obtain satisfaction for their wants. And that nation is rich when its inhabitants are happy.

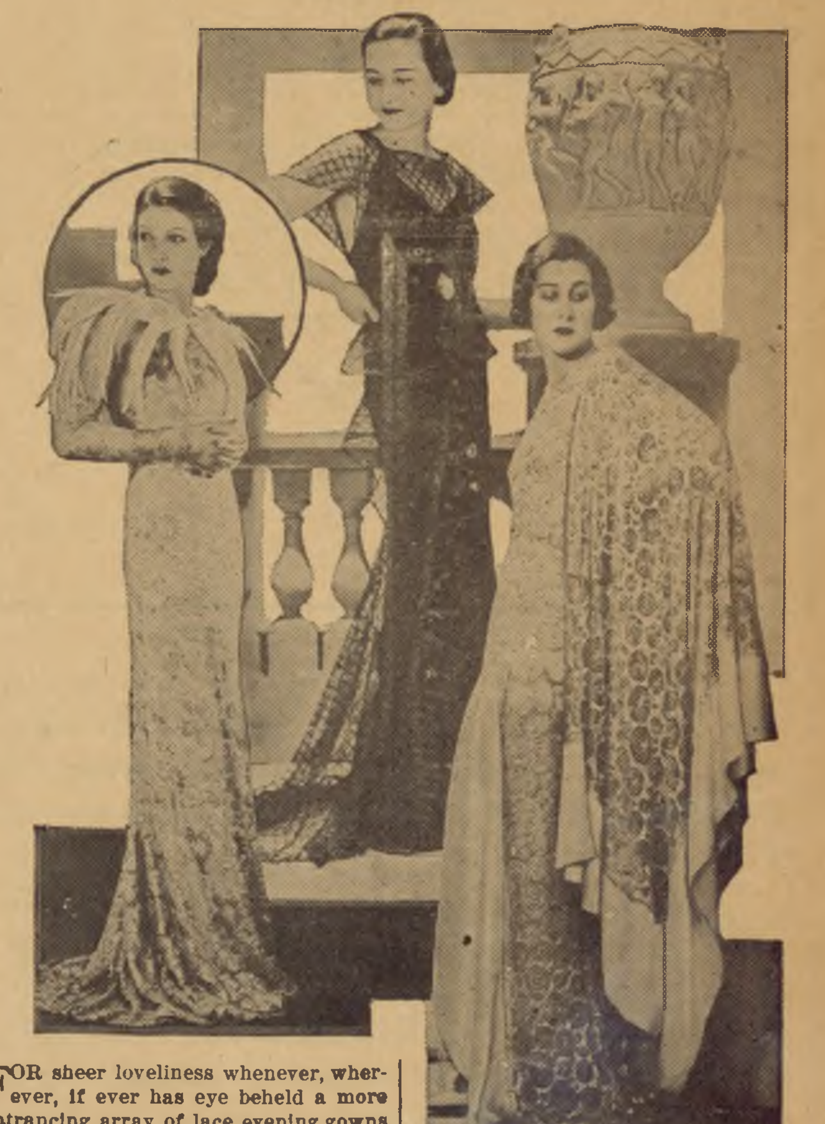
Paris Acclaims the Beauty of Lace

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



FOR sheer loveliness whenever, wherever, if ever has eye beheld a more entrancing array of lace evening gowns than those which are now gracing the midwinter social scene! When we say sheer loveliness we mean just that—sheer and lovely as the smart new laces and nets, chiffons and marquisettes can make the party frocks and evening formals now so voguish.

The importance of lace and net and various beauteous sheers of similar character cannot be over emphasized. Reports pour in from Paris in regard to the enthusiasm shown for gowns that are that thin and fluttery and diaphanous they needs must be made over foundational slips of silk, or satin, crepe or lame.

In describing the group of distinguished lace fashions pictured, we are so enthusiastic about the superbly lovely lace frock to the right in the trio we are going to tell about it first. It is a wedding gown which is real style news, gives it an added touch of glamor and romance, too. More and more brides are intrigued with the idea of lace for the all-important nuptial event. One of the reasons, perhaps, is that lace is so luxurious and beautiful in itself, it needs no furbelows and intricate cutting to enhance it. Silver lace is particularly sumptuous and it makes a really thrilling wedding gown. Ardanse of Paris, whose creations are ever strikingly original, creates this exquisite bridal costume of this silver lace. It has a square court train which may be draped as a wrap, as here shown, which makes it practical for the bride to wear as an evening gown later. A white satin godet is inserted at the side-front. The same satin borders the train, also the long sleeves.

In the charming black lace dress centered in the picture, Patou has very ingeniously contrived to coax a youthful little peplum to circle the hips and go ruffling down the back. From the picture one might easily fancy that net of large open mesh fashioned this dress instead of lace. However, it is really a rather heavy lace, smartly patterned in a conventional design which is younger looking than the more formal and ornate orals. There is just enough sophistication about this dainty frock to appeal to the bud "just out" in society who aspires to poise and dignity.

Speaking of the new net frocks, likewise the now-so-voguish marquisettes, they are going in for color for all they are worth, unusual tones such as raspberry, violet (said to be the coming big color), Marina blue, rust and dark red.

In regard to the gown illustrated to the left in the group, color adds to the enchantment of the lace which fashions it. For this gown of classic simplicity Callot uses a gorgeous copper-colored lame lace, posing it over a white crepy silk slip. The collar of white coq feathers is a grand climax.

A word should be spoken in regard to the tendency this season to employ laces of a filmy texture both in colors and black. The newer black lace dresses hold one almost spellbound in their fragile beauty. Then, too, among recent showings are stunning lace modes which display a riot of fine knife pleatings which form wide ounces and bertha off-shoulder decollettes and shoulder capes and other captivating details.

CONTRAST SLEEVES

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The idea of sleeves contrasting the rest of the dress is holding good in midseason styling. Advance spring fashions and resort modes also emphasize this feature. Not only are sleeves in direct contrast but the matter of cutting sleeves and yoke in one is important, according to reports in regard to advance fashions. The dinner dress pictured is of dull black velvet with cut-in-one sleeves and yoke of sheer ribbed velvet which makes this dress practical for late-into-the-spring wear. A delicate rhinestone necklace, just the right length for the neckline, adds formality. The wide rhinestone bracelet also sounds the glittering note which fashion demands for evening. In reality this dress is part of a suit, having a simple, fitted hiplength jacket fastened at the small turnover collar with two handsome silver fox tails.

Feathers on Gowns

NEW WRINKLES IN SPRING SHOWINGS

Peplums and pleats are the new wrinkles in advance style showings for spring, and in last-word touches for mid-winter costumes.

Pleats are cropping out all over the place—in evening gowns and daytime frocks, used to give skirt fullness in back or front, or to add character to a peplum flare.

They are showing up even in hatbrims and in scarfs, in bustle effects on evening gowns and in whole skirts for formal costumes of the naughty nineties school.

Sheer evening gowns are knockouts with voluminous skirts knife-pleated from waist to floor, with an additional pleated peplum flare on the fitted waist-length jacket.

Wide Belts and Princess Lines Are Now Emphasized

Two fashion specifications—wide belts and princess lines—are emphasized to a degree that makes it seem certain that there's to be no fooling about women keeping their waistlines well corseted and smooth.

In either case, it must be carefully and thoroughly digested that it is not a pulled-in or nipped waistline. Wide belts are now shaped so that they have a curved profile to coincide with the natural waistline, and thus putting a stop once and for all to the abrupt cut at top and bottom that has been the big drawback in wide belts in the past.

Turtle Neck Collar

The turtle neck collar is a feature of many sweaters and a novelty is the posing of this collar in a dark color on a light sweater, such as wine red on a creamy off-white.

Tucked Gloves

This season gloves entirely streaked with parallel lines of pin tucking will be worn by the Parisienne with her pin-tucked kidskin shoes.

THE LEGISLATURE CONVENES

The eyes of the state are turned this week to the Capitol City where the quadrenniel session of the Legislature is convening. The lawmakers of this session are facing far more problems than any other session has faced in many years.

One of the most important and urgent situations which faces the legislators is the problem of the Schools. This must be faced and adequately provided for. Whatever else may occupy the time and thought of the body, surely none is more important than the responsibility of providing for the education of Alabama's children and the provision for adepuate compensation for those who make this education possible. It is expected that this session will not adjourn until this situation has been analyzed and cared for.

Another measure for consideration is the continued program of economy that has dominated the last administration. The state has been operating on a pay as you go basis and the end of the present governor's term is marked by a cash surplus. It is parctically certain that with Mr. Graves advocating no increase in taxation, this program will be a part of the new administration.

Not the least of the problems to be faced by the legislature is that of prohibition. With the new governor urging no action until a referedum, it reasonably certain that nothing will be done in this regard except setting up the machinery for an early voting of the citizens of the state.

Withal, the lawmakers have a gigantic task. Problems which were not their predecessors are theirs. It is hoped that they will force them fairly and intelligently, fearlessly and sympathetically.

BANKING EVOLUTION

By R. S HECHT
President American Bankers Association

BANKING at one time was a private business, but more recently has developed into a profession—a semi-public profession. This change has not come suddenly but is the result of an evolutionary process. Banking has grown and changed with the growth and change of our country.

R. S. HECHT

The banker who has survived the trials and tribulations of the past few years has proven himself a man of courage and ability, and we may well expect him to meet the problems that lie before him with resolution and sound judgment.

Changes of momentous importance have occurred in our economic structures and bankers have had a difficult road to travel. Some will argue that all of these changes were evolutionary and inevitable, while others look upon many of them as revolutionary and unnecessary. It is extremely difficult to trace with any degree of accuracy the real causes for many of our troubles and it is not always easy in judging these developments to distinguish properly between cause and effect.

Unfortunately it has become the fashion to blame on our banking system all the troubles which the depression has brought. As a consequence we hear much of needed reform of banking by law. No one will deny that certain defects have developed in our existing banking laws which need correction, and that certain abuses were committed which no one wishes to defend or have remain possible in the future. Never before were bankers more determined than they are today to bring about whatever changes in our banking system are called for by the public welfare.

The best results can and will be accomplished by normal processes and gradual adjustments of our present private banking structure—suitably supervised by proper authority—rather than by the passage of still more drastic laws, offering panaceas in the form of more government-owned or government-controlled financial organizations.

The Basis of Good Laws

Lasting laws relating to any phase of human need are formed and modelled in the rough school of practical human experience and are usually the result of sound evolutionary processes rather than of sudden impulses to change fundamental principles.

If we analyze the new banking picture which has developed during the past eighteen months, we cannot help but arrive at the conclusion that evolutionary changes which have taken place in banking, and the economic life of the nation of which it is a part, have justified much of the banking legislation recently passed. As we look ahead and consider the new problems which are facing us we must inevitably come to the conclusion that some further changes in our banking laws will become necessary.

It is not enough that bankers merely acquiesce in banking imposed by law. Zeal for evolutionary banking reform must be more aggressive than that. Banking practice itself, without compulsion of law, can and should reflect the changes and lessons of the times and difficulties through which the nation has passed and, even to a greater extent than law, render banking more truly a good public servant by voluntary self-reform. In no small measure is this accomplished by the better training of the members of the banking [illegible] by [illegible] constantly higher ideals in those who are ultimately responsible for bank management.

As we march on into the world of tomorrow the banker has a greater opportunity for usefulness than ever before, and I hope that the service he will render to society will be so conscientious, so constructive and so satisfactory as to merit general approval and assure him his logical high place and leadership.

ADS. WILL TELL BANKERS' STORY

American Bankers Association President Announces Move to Stimulate Newspaper Advertising

NEW YORK.—Plans for stimulating wider use of informative newspaper advertising by banks in promoting public understanding and confidence in regard to existing banking conditions and methods have been announced by [illegible]. S. Hecht, President of the American Bankers Association, as a part of his organization's activities in aid of business recovery.

A general groundwork was prepared through a nationwide survey of advertising by banks relative to their willingness to extend justifiable loans to industry and trade. This, he said, revealed that a large number in all parts of the country are pursuing aggressive policies along this line and encouraging their customers to develop forward-looking business plans. "It is our aim to aid in fostering this constructive attitude whenever possible," he said.

The Theme of New Advertising

The association's Advertising Department, under the direct supervision of the general executive officers, has prepared, at the headquarters in New York City, an informative advertising series for the use of member banks in the association to aid them in developing in their own communities better general public understanding regarding banking, Mr. Hecht said.

"The underlying theme of this advertising is that sound banking is based on helpful human relations and that it has a unity of interest with the people of its community which binds them together with a common purpose," he said.

"We are confident that if a clear understanding of this is brought home to the people in all our banking communities, it will go far in restoring the public confidence which good banking deserves. A bank in which people deservedly believe is doubly safe, it is to the public interest for the people to have confidence in their banks.

The Place of Advertising

"We feel that bank advertising has a special public duty to perform in this connection under existing conditions. The copy which will be supplied in the service we have developed will not only aid the individual bank in promoting the use of its own facilities but is also aimed to bring about with the aid of newspaper advertising a clearer public viewpoint regarding the essential part it occupies in the life of its community."

Mr. Hecht emphasized in regard to the new advertising facilities being offered to the members of the association that they are not a profit making venture and that there is no intention to disturb existing advertising arrangements, the idea being that these institutional services shall supplement rather than replace present plans, or that they will give assistance to member banks now lacking satisfactory arrangements.

Crop Acreage Higher In Ala.

The total acreage devoted to forty-four principal crops in Alabama, excluding duplication, was, in 1932, 7,367,000, in 1933, 6,324,000, and in 1934, 6,686,000.

The total fram value of all crops grown in Alabama, based on the December 1 price was, in 1932, $62,051,000, in 1933, $99,454,000, and in 1934, $142,975,000.

Crop prices as an average for the United States in 1932 was 48 per cent of the average of 1909-13. This was the low point since 1919. In 1933 the average had advanced to 81 per cent, and in 1934 had further advanced to 115 per cent.

Crop yields this year, based on the averages of thirty-three important crops, in Alabama was 122 per cent of the ten year average, while in the U. S. it was only 81 per cent. The average for Alabama this year was the best in the United States. South Carolina was a close second with 121 per cent.

In the tabulation showing acreage, production, and value of crops in Alabama for 1933 and 1934 the figures concerning peanuts, velvet beans, and soybeans, represent the entire acreage from which these crops were utilized, either by harvest for grain or hogging off, except the acreage devoted exclusively to soybean hay. The acreage given to peanuts and soybeans are the equivalent of solid acres and represent the acres grown alone and with corn

The total value of all crops in Alabama averages $107.00 per capita of farm population for 1934 against $74,00 in 1933 and $46,00 in 1932.. The value per farm in 1934 is $550.000 against $333.00 in 1933 and $239.00 in 1932. The average value per acre in 1934 is $21.38 compared with $[illegible].73 in 1933 and [illegible] 42 in 1932. OUTLOOK the last several years. The demand for credit will probably exceed that of 1934 since the accumulated needs for equipment and repairs are much greater than in recent years.

A further reduction in world carry-over of American cotton is expected by August 1 next, even should world consumption be less this season than last. World supply of all cotton for the 1934-35 season is estimate at 5 to 10 per cent less than the record supply of 1933-34, but considerably more than for any year prior to 1931-32.

Further expansion of cotton production in foreign countries is expected. But this is likely to take place slowly since there are factors which tend to retard such developments in most of the foreign cotton producing areas. Cotton acreage in the United States will be increased next year, since the adjustment contracts that cover both years provide for a maximum reduction in 1935 of 25 percent from the grower's base acreage, whereas in 1934 the contact signers planted 38 percent less acreage than during the base period.

A substantial advance in prices of all meat animals is expected. Numbers and weights of animals slaughtered will be reduced, and the general quality and finish of these animals will be much below average. Slaughter reduction is expected to be pronounced after February next, and the greatest relative shortage will develop next summer. The decrease in pork production will be relatively more than that of beef or lamb.

Cattle prices are expected to average materially higher next year, and marketing and slaughter of cattle and calves to be greatly reduced. High cattle prices relative to feed prices during the next few years are expected to result in increased cattle production in all areas, and especially in this year's drought area.

Possibility of a further reduction in hog production next year is seen, since the spring pig crop is expected to be smaller than that of last spring, and it is considered unlikely that the 1935 fall crop will be big enough to off-set this decrease. Hog prices are expected to average materially higher than the relatively low prices of the last 3 marketing years, and to continue high through the following winter season. Per capita production of hog products this marketing year will be the smallest in half a century.

A generally favorably outlook for poultrymen this fall and winter is seen, except in severe drought areas where scarcity of grain is forcing a drastic reduction in poultry stocks. Supplies of eggs and poultry will be relatively short until next summer when chickens of next year's hatching begin to affect supplies. Prices of poultry products are expected to continue at seasonally high levels until that time. Turkey prices are expected to be higher this year on account of the moderately smaller crop and reduced supplies of other meats.

The dairy outlook this feeding season is stated to be unfavorable on account of the shortage of hay and grain.. Prices of hay and grain are higher in comparison with the price of butter-fat than in any previous fall since 1911, and the price of feed is expected to continue unusually high this winter in comparison with prices of dairy products. A low level of milk production this winter is probable. The number of milk cows is being rapidly reduced, fewer heifers are being raised, and the extensive drought damage to pastures, meadows, and new seedings will tend to restrict expansion of dairying in 1935..

A more favorable market outlook for commercial truck crops for fresh market shipment is seen, in view of higher wholesale food prices, and the

More About Origin of "O. K."

Ohio Writer Admits That His Great State Has Been Wrongly Credited With Giving Birth to This Most Popular Americanism.

For contrary to state-wide belief, the Whig rally in Urbana in the campaign of 1840 was not the occasion for the origin of O. K., probably our most popular Americanism. And as a result of evidence disproving this version, its origin is as definitely unknown and as open to speculation as ever, H. J. Carr writes, in the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

A unique expression, employed by every one from college presidents to illiterates (President Wilson used it on official documents) and understood the world over as denoting agreement or approval of something, O. K. has been traced back by authorities to various sources.

While the New Standard dictionary says it is the result of the misreading of O. R., "ordered recorded," Webster's New International tells us it probably comes from the Choctaw okeh. "It is so and not otherwise."

According to another version, it is a hangover from Gen. Andrew Jackson's use of these letters to indorse official papers as correct (Orl Korrect)—which, as a stab at his illiteracy, was employed as a party cry in the campaign of 1832.

Moreover, while some attribute it to Josh Billings and fellow humorists; others contend that Jacob Astor voiced it to indicate the standing of traders about whom he was questioned. Another speculation attributes its origin to Old Keokuk, an Indian chief who is said to have signed treaties with the initials O. K.

In Colonial days the best tobacco and rum were imported from Aux Cayes, and from this fact Aux Cayes (pronounced O K), became a popular expression for excellence. Etcetera, etcetera—in fact, this expression that you say every day has been traced back to almost everything except as an incident in the fall of the Roman empire.

But the most popularly accepted version, because of its probability, has been the Urbana Whig rally of September 15, 1840, in which Ohio's Gen. W. H. Harrison was making a bid for the Presidency. The success of a political meeting in those days was judged by the attendance, the number of wagons drawn by the most horses, the number and bigness of banners and the catchy slogans painted on them.

For this tumultuous gathering, at which General Harrison spoke for two hours, twelve tables were set, each 200 feet long, from which the thousands and thousands of persons were stuffed with barbecued oxen, sheep, deer and other mammalia, and of course honest-to-goodness hard cider, which was as necessary then as nickel cigars are now.

One enthusiastic Whig farmer, to make an ostentatious impression in the parade, rigged up a large wagon drawn by many horses with a platform to accommodate his neighbors. On a banner suspended over the platform was crudely painted the inscription: The People Is Oll Korrect.

Seizing upon the misspelling, Democratic papers exhibited it as evidence of the ignorance of the supporters of Harrison. Orators carried around handbills bearing the slogan and threw them out to the shouting hearers. Samuel Medary, famous for his zeal in attacking the Whigs in his paper, the Statesman, enjoyed himself devoting his columns to the farmer's illiteracy, which was supposed to be typical of everyone favoring Harrison.

This mounting ridicule, getting under their skin, continued to baffle all faithful Whigs—that is, all except one. He was Daniel Leffel, a typical tavern proprietor of the time, who thought it best to ward off the derision by making the most of the mistake. So he painted O K in large capital letters over the front door of his tavern in Springfield to convey the impression that his tavern was "Oll Korrect."

The "O. K." inn, as it was on the national highway, which led to the great West, was visited by numerous travelers; and this strange combination of letters lingered in their memory, especially since the hospitality, food and spirits were as "Oll Korrect" as advertised. And so these travelers began to jocularly recommend things as O. K.

Leffel's tavern was spared until 1901, when it was torn down to make room for the Ohio State Masonic home, into whose ownership the property had passed. The originally inscribed O K remained above the door for about 60 years until the bricks upon which it was painted were removed and scattered by the wrecking crew.

That the farmer of Champaign county displayed a banner bearing Oll Korrect and that these letters were painted on this wayside inn in Springfield are unquestionable facts.

But that the expression had its origin in this meeting is untrue, for the reason that Samuel Medary, who was supposed to have started the ball rolling in print, had used the expression in his paper several days before the rally took place.

Record Pilgrimage

Nearly 60,000 men, all ex-soldiers of 15 nations, recently took part in the largest pilgrimage ever made to the shrine of Our Lady of Lourdes at Lourdes, France. Three former enemies stood guard over the famous grotto, they being, at the request of the pope, a German, a Belgian and a Frenchman. Among the countries represented were the United States, Canada, Great Britain, France, Belgium, Italy, Germany, Hungary, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and Brazil.

How Calotabs Help Nature To Throw Off a Bad Cold

Millions have found in Calotabs a most valuable aid in the treatment of colds. They take one or two tablets the first night and repeat the third or fifth night if needed.

How do Calotabs help Nature throw off a cold? First, Calotabs are one of the most thorough and dependable of all intestinal eliminants, thus cleansing the intestinal tract of the germ-laden mucus and toxines. Second, Calotabs are diuretic to the kidneys, promoting the elimination of cold poisons from the blood. Thus Calotabs serve the double purpose of a purgative and diuretic, both of which are needed in the treatment of colds.

Calotabs are quite economical; only twenty-five cents for the family package, ten cents for the trial package. (Adv.)

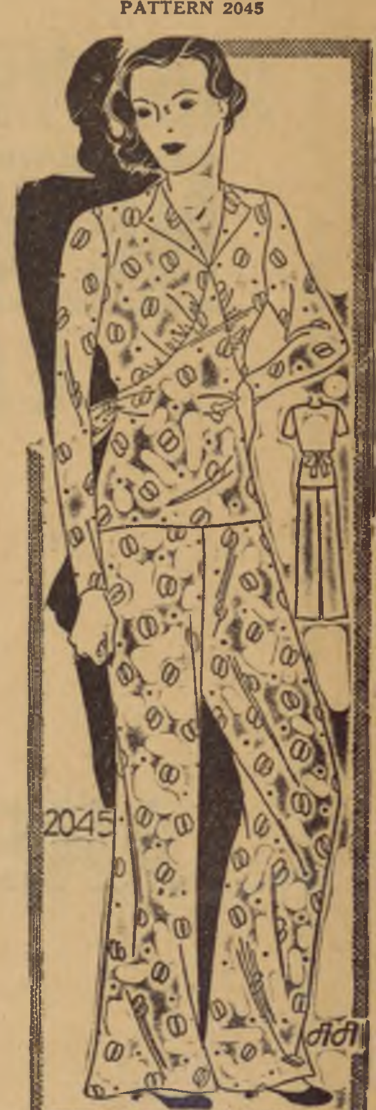
Smartness This Pajama Keynote

PATTERN 2045



There is no reason why pajamas should not be as smart as anything else a woman wears—and every reason why they should. Here are some that are as carefully designed as a suit. Look at the way that girdle business mounts in a becoming V in the front and ties in a clever bow in the back, emphasizing the slender lines of the waist. Those tiny revers are exactly the finish it needs at the neck, and the well-cut trousers are both comfortable and good looking. It is, of course, a two-piece model, nice to make in a neatly patterned cotton or a plain or figured flannel or challis.

Pattern 2045 is available in sizes 12, 14, 16, 18 and 20. Size 16 takes 4⅝ yards 36 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

OUTLOOK

Potato supplies in 1935, probably as large or slightly larger than in 1934 may be produced if average weather conditions prevail, since growers, should they respond to to price as they have responded in the past, will still be influenced by the favorable prices received for their 1933 crop and probably will plant about 3,313,000 acres. Normal yields on this acreage would produce 365,000,000 bushels, which is a larger crop than could be marketed to advantage.

A demand for sweet potatoes slightly greater than it was this year is expected next year, largely because the general level of food prices is higher than it has been. A considerable decrease in cabbage acreage is expected on account of current low prices. Tomato growers, encouraged by 1934 prices, may produce and an excessive market supply next year. Late onion growers are told that ordinarily a little less than 50,000 acres will produce an ample supply of late onions to meet consumption requirements. An expansion of watermelon acreage next year may result in excessive production and a substantial reduction in growers' income.

President O. C. Carmichael, of Alabama College, returned Monday after taking part in three meetings of Rhodes Scholarship Committees of Selection. He was on the Alabama, Mississippi and Gulf District Committees.

MILLERS EDUCATION VIEWS RESENTED BY DOWLING

Montgomery,—"School people and school board members of Alabama will resent deeply Governor Miller's reference to education in his final message to the Legislature", says H. G. Dowling, Superintendent of Tuscaloosa County Schools and President of the Alabama Education Association.

"When they think over the implications of the Governor's claim that school financial troubles are due to mismanagement and to wild spending of future revenues for 'beautiful buildings', they will find it hard to restrain their statements. Some counties of Alabama with no indebtness at all are today faced with the closing of their school doors. Governor Miller has earned the gratitude and respect of teachers and other citizens for certain constructive accompments of his administration; but his attitude toward education has throughout been one very difficult of explanation.

"In justice to education, Legislators and others are urged to consider the following facts taken from official records:

1. The total debt of county boards of education of Alabama is $5,942,000, existing mainly in the form of school building warrants. Four months' school revenue from state, county, and district sources would wipe out the entire indebtness. In addition, the cities of the state have a school building indebtedness but this is practically all charged to cities taxes allowed by city councils and voters and has no relation to current school revenues.

2. Due to legislation and to lack of legislation during the last four years, schools have suffered a net loss in annual income of $5,250,000. Meanwhile the load in number of pupils, particularly in rural areas, has steadily climbed. Building and repair to keep up with mounting enrollments has been practically at a standstill except where fed-

PROHIBITION FORCES MAKE DRIVE IN STATE FOR RETENTION

The Alabama Alliance of Anti-Repeal forces have opened State headquarters at 1601-4 Comer Building in Birmingham, with telephone number 7-7363.

State and County orginzation is going foward rapidly under the leadership of H. L. Anderton, Birmingham attorney, who was selected on December 6th by the combined dry forces of the State as State Campaign Director. Each county of the State will be organized and County Directors will be selected.

Mr. Anderton made the following statement:

"The United drys place John Barleycorn as Public Enemy No. 1. We have organized to fight repeal to the bitter end. We expect to win.

"No individual is now running for office. No political parties are involved. The referendum presents to our citizens a straight moral issue. Shall Alabama subject her people, old and young, to the ravages of strong drink? On her answer to this question hangs the welfare of our people.

"We shall fight with fair method and without malice toward anyone. Our fight will be for a sober citizenship and for the best interests of a million and a half o fAlabama boys and girls. We call upon every citizen who would not have his children debauched by strong drink to join us in this battle for safety and sobriety.

"We shall oppose legislation of all intoxicating liquors including beers and wines. Wherever beer has been legalized it has greatly increased drunkenness. It cultivates appetites for stronge drinks. It is a menace to the public in automobile driving.

"We warn the people of Alabama that if conditions are bad in our State now they will be a thousand times worse if we repeal our laws and turn our people over to the greed of the foreign liquor lords. Wherever state laws have

Major B. R. Patton, camp director of the Alabama Transsient Bureau at Fort Morgan, has advised I. T. Quinn, state commissioner of game and fisheries, that the state transsient bureau authorities are anxious to undertake a game breeding project at the site of the old fort.

Fort Morgan is well located for a game farm, Major Patton said, and he hopes a conference between Commissioner Quinn and F. F. Newcomb, the Alabama transient director will result in the project bestarted.

"We are very anxious to start a project for the state, in experimenting and rasing quail and pheasants to turn over to the state," said the Major. "What we intend to do if this project meets with approval, is secure all the possible data we can to hatch and cultivate these birds for your department's use. This will be done on scientific basis and by competent hands."

HAROLD TITUS

Author of THE MAN FROM YONDER

Supreme Court Takes Up Gold Clause Abrogation Case—Senate Committee Favors World Court Adherence—Congress Gets the Budget.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

HAVING given the New Deal a slight swat by holding the petroleum control feature of the NIRA unconstitutional, the Supreme Court moved rapidly toward a judgment as to the legality of the abrogation of gold payments. Several cases challenging this act were lumped and oral arguments were heard. This being a matter of vast importance, involving $100,000,000,000, Attorney General Homer S. Cummings himself appeared to present the case for the government. Mr. Cummings is an excellent lawyer, but not much can be said in praise of the legal abilities of most of the men whom the exigencies of politics have shoved into his office in Washington. So probably he was wise to handle this matter himself.

Attorney General Cummings

Cummings defended the constitutional authority of the President and congress to adopt the present monetary policy as inherently the right of the government to preserve itself.

In an argument distinguished for oratorical display as well as for its legal aspects, Cummings said an adverse decision by the court would:

1. Increase the public and private debt of the nation by $69,000,000,000.
2. Create a special class that would be beyond the pale of the general financial structure, a class composed of those holding bonds demanding payment in gold.
3. Reduce the balance in the United States treasury $2,500,000,000.
4. Add $17,000,000,000 to the public debt and increase the interest charge on this debt alone by $2,500,000,000 a year.

The latter sum alone, Cummings said, is equal to twice the value of the 1934 wheat and cotton crop.

The attorney general referred to the troubled state of the country in the spring of 1933 and added, "I contend and shall show that the congress and the President of the United States acted reasonably in a period of very great difficulties and that their acts were not the product of caprice."

From the questions asked by the justices, observers gained the impression that there was a sharp division of opinion among them.

SENATOR JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, majority leader of the senate, being informed that the foreign relations committee had voted 14 to 7 in favor of the project for American adherence to the World court, said he would bring the resolution up on the floor of the senate as soon as possible. However he recognized the sentiment against it was strong and would not predict the outcome of the fight.

The new resolution as approved by the committee is slightly altered to meet the objections of other nations to what is known as reservation five. Mr. Robinson said:

"The legal import and effect of reservation five has been preserved in full. It is provided that discussions may take place under the Root protocol, but in the end the court may not entertain over the objection of the United States any request for an advisory opinion on any dispute or question in which the United States has or claims an interest."

Of the Democrats on the committee Senators Lewis and Murray voted against the resolution; Republicans who favored it were Vandenberg and Capper.

PETROLEUM control provisions of the National Industrial Recovery act, specifically section 9 (c), are held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be invalid as unconstitutional abdication of legislative power to the President. Eight of the justices united in rendering this decision, Justice Cardozo alone dissenting, and the opinion was read by Chief Justice Hughes.

The section declared void authorized the President to ban interstate shipment of "hot" oil—that is, oil produced in excess of state quotas.

While the opinion did not deal with other phases of the recovery act, it aroused widespread speculation as to disposition of other cases. This was the first major "New Deal" case to come before the court.

Emergency legislation by congress to remedy the situation and to meet the objection of the court was reported to be an immediate likelihood.

THOSE Democrats and Republicans, eminent and otherwise, who are banded together as the American Liberty league are now really getting into action against what they deem the radical features of the administration's program, and their executive council has put out a ten-point platform. It declares the league's opposition to such practices as sweeping delegations of legislative authority to the President, lump sum appropriations to be doled out by the White House, socialization of industry and regimentation of American life.

In the first plank of its platform the league pledged itself "to preserve American institutions which safeguard to citizens in all walks of life the right to liberty and pursuit of happiness" and at the same time "to combat the growth of bureaucracy, the spread of monopoly, the socialization of industry, and the regimentation of American life."

Invasion of the law making and law interpreting functions by New Deal administrators was also rapped by the league in promising "to uphold the American principle that laws be made only by the direct representatives of the people in the congress, and that the laws be interpreted only by the courts."

Other points in the 10-point declaration of policy pledged the league to fight for government economy, a sound federal fiscal policy, a stable currency, protection for investors, and individual liberties.

BECAUSE work relief must be carried on the federal budget will not be balanced for the coming fiscal year, and probably not for several years thereafter. In presenting the budget to congress, President Roosevelt admitted this, but without qualms. He estimated $8,520,000,000 as the amount of money necessary to carry on the government's activities for the 1936 fiscal year beginning July 1 next. The expenses for the current year, partly estimated, are $8,581,000,000.

President Roosevelt

If one wishes to know who spends all these huge sums, an idea may be obtained from these figures showing the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1936:

1. Legislative, judicial and executive	36,595,000
2. Civil departments and agencies	788,057,169
3. National defense ...	792,484,265
4. Veterans' pensions and benefits	704,885,500
5. Debt charges:
Interest	875,000,000
Retirements	636,434,000
6. Refunds	64,946,200
7. Recovery and relief	4,582,011,475
8. Supplemental items (for above groups 1 to 4 inclusive)	40,000,000
Total expenditures..	$8,520,413,608

Total receipts for the same period are put at $3,991,904,639, so the estimated deficit will be $4,528,508,970.

Of the recovery and relief fund the President asked that $4,000,000,000 be placed at his disposal to be allocated by him "principally for giving work to those unemployed on the relief rolls."

The national debt will increase from $31,000,000,000 at the close of this fiscal year to $34,239,000,000.

No new taxes are requested. Congress is asked to continue the so-called nuisance taxes which expire soon and the 3-cent stamp rate.

A total of 137,134 federal workers are to be dismissed.

Veterans pensions in 1936 will reach the staggering total of $704,000,000.

The accumulated New Deal deficit for three years on June 30, 1936, will total $11,700,000,000.

While the trend of recovery and relief expenditures is downward, regular federal expenses will increase.

MARY PICKFORD went before Judge Ben Lindsey in Los Angeles and obtained a decree of divorce from Douglas Fairbanks; and thus came to an end the union of the "royal couple" of moviedom, who for ten years were regarded as the model wedded pair so far as happiness and worldly success went.

Mary's suit, filed more than a year ago, charged Doug with mental cruelty, indifference and neglect. She told Judge Lindsey the charges were true and that a fair and just property settlement had been made; and after Elizabeth Lewis, Miss Pickford's secretary, had testified the decree was granted and Mary left the courtroom almost in tears.

Fairbanks, in St. Moritz, Switzerland, was informed of the divorce but declined to comment.

EX-PRESIDENT HERBERT HOOVER has been elected a director of the New York Life Insurance company, at the instance of Alfred E. Smith. He was first offered the place two years ago when the death of Calvin Coolidge created a vacancy. Mr. Hoover said: "I have accepted in the hope of contributing something to the protection and advancement of the interests of millions of policy holders, for in these great insurance trusts lies one of the most vital of personal securities to the women and children of the country."

IN THE highly dramatized trial of Bruno Hauptmann for the kidnaping and murder of the Lindbergh baby the state continued to weave a strong net of circumstantial evidence around the defendant. Lindbergh first identified his voice as that of the man who received the ransom; next was Amandus Hochmuth, eighty-seven-year-old man who told of seeing Hauptmann driving a "dirty-green" car with a ladder in it into the Lindbergh lane March 1, 1932, the day of the kidnaping. Then John Perrone, Bronx taxi driver, identified him as the man who paid him $1 to deliver a ransom note to "Jafsie."

"Jafsie," otherwise Dr. John Condon, the aged Bronx educator who undertook the negotiations with the kidnaper, next went on the stand and in his garrulous way identified Bruno as the man with whom he dealt and to whom he handed the $50,000 ransom money. His long and somewhat rambling story was bitterly assailed in cross examination by E. J. Reilly, chief of defense counsel, but seemingly the great value of his evidence was not much shaken.

Detective Arthur Johnson of New York was on his way home from Europe bringing relatives of the late Isadore Fisch to testify for the state. Hauptmann claimed in his defense that the ransom money found in his possession was given to him by Fisch, a business associate in New York. Fisch later returned to his home in Germany, where he died.

AN APOLOGY to the Canadian government and payments of $50,666.50 damages is the penalty imposed on the United States for sinking the rum running schooner I'm Alone in the Gulf of Mexico in March of 1929. This decision was announced by Willis Van Devanter, associate justice of the United States Supreme court, and Sir Lyman Poore Duff, chief justice of Canada, who were the commissioners of arbitration under the ship liquor treaty of 1924 between the United States and Great Britain for controlling liquor smuggling.

Of the damages awarded, $25,000 is to be paid as compensation to the Canadian government and $25,666,50 to the master and members of the crew of the I'm Alone or their families. Included in the latter is $10.185 to the widow and children of Leon Mainguy, a French citizen of St. Pierre, Miquelon, who drowned when the schooner was sunk by the coastguard.

The commissioners found that the master and members of the crew were not parties to a liquor smuggling conspiracy.

THERE were huge sighs of relief in the chancelleries of Europe when the success of the conversations in Rome between Foreign Minister Pierre Laval of France and Premier Mussolini was announced informally. For two days the two statesmen discussed the points at issue between their nations and conditions in general in central Europe. Emerging from the last of their meetings, Laval, smiling broadly, said to a group of French and Italian war veterans.

Pierre Laval

"I am glad to tell you that Premier Mussolini and I are now in complete accord."

Without waiting for an official communique, those best informed said Laval and il duce had reached a full agreement, the principal features of which are a joint declaration to preserve the independence of Austria, a five or six power pact of noninterference, and provisions for colonial concessions in Africa. The pact agreeing not to interfere with one another's internal affairs presumably will include Italy, Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, Austria, and Hungary; and later England, France and Rumania may be asked to adhere to it.

SENATOR HUEY P. LONG, after attacking the administration on the floor of the senate, betook himself to the radio and continued the assault. He declared the Roosevelt policies were hopeless, and summoned all the people to flock to his banner and help wipe out all fortunes above three or four millions, "making every man a king."

Meantime the revolt against the kingfish in Louisiana was growing. Citizens by the hundreds were joining the Square Deal association which is pledged to march on the capitol in Baton Rouge unless the legislature repeals certain of Huey's dictatorial laws.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATOR ICKES has resumed his contest with Arizona over the building of the Parker dam in the Colorado river and wants the Supreme court to keep that state and its "navy," consisting of one scow, from interfering with the job. Solicitor General Biggs asked permission of the court to file suit for an injunction.

The governor of Arizona recently called out his militia and his navy to keep the public administration from completing the dam. He held that it would interfere with the distribution of irrigation water in his state.

PREMIER R. B. BENNETT of Canada, appealing for support for his administration, promises to give the Dominion a "New Deal" that bears a close resemblance to President Roosevelt's economic and social program. He outlined his proposals in a speech in which he demanded "an end to the reckless exploitation of human resources and the trafficking in the health and happiness of Canadian citizens."

Nice Lump Sum
The President at Work
Free Tombstone
Button-Pushing Days

Congress will give President Roosevelt a lump sum, a considerable lump of four thousand million dollars, to let him change from the system of doles and imitation jobs, "picking up leaves and pieces of paper," to real jobs and useful work.

In his new White House offices, President Roosevelt is at work on a "social security program," which will include unemployment insurance and old age pensions. The idea is to let pay rolls contribute to the cost of insurance and pensions. This might work well with normal pay rolls.

You hope that the President, in his wisdom, will include in any "security" program security for the nation, in addition to security for individuals, old or out of a job.

Unemployment insurance and old age pensions would do little good if a few thousand planes came flying from Europe or Asia to bomb our cities and spray them with poison gas. If they came now, they could do exactly as they pleased. We have no way of interfering with them.

Bruno Hauptmann's musings on fate's vagaries were interrupted the other day by a strange offer from Mr. Standish Hartman, who owns the old Flemington stone works, manufacturing tombstones, just opposite the Hauptmann jail.

Hauptmann was told, "If you are sent to the electric chair I will let you pick out your own tombstone, free, and help you write the epitaph. I will make it a work of art that people will go a long way to see, one that any man would be proud to have."

It should take genius to devise a tombstone that "any man would be proud to have" if he got it after being executed for murder.

A day is coming when no man will do any work harder than pressing a button, and science, incidentally, will make crime obsolete.

For instance, the Joliet (Ill.) jailer sent a fat "trusty" outdoors for a cigar, and the automatic "electric eye" at the gate saw him, flashed a light and the innocent fat "trusty" was searched. A small metal shoehorn was found in his big loose shoe.

The electric eye flashes when anybody passing the gate has any sort of metal in his possession. No prisoner's friend hereafter can take in a pistol, file or steel saw.

If you buy alcoholic drinks, buy from dealers in whom you have confidence. The federal government has seized one million one hundred thousand empty whisky, wine and liquor bottles to prevent bootleggers refilling them with bootleg supplies.

An empty whisky bottle, bought for two cents, filled with eight cents' worth of bootleg whisky, may mean profit for the bootlegger and mean poison for the consumer. Buy from a retailer whom you trust, who buys from those who manufacture legally, and buy brands that you know.

To comfort those appropriating and spending large sums of public money fighting the depression it can be said, quite reasonably, that there would be no danger in spending $100,000,000,000 more, considering that the normal income of the United States, in really good times, is close to $100,000,000,000. If a man spent one or even two years' income to settle all his troubles you'd think the price reasonable.

It would be a silly mistake, of course, to issue the $100,000,000,000 in bonds and pay out another $100,000,000,000 for interest, unnecessarily. That needs to be said and will be said quite often.

To read that Harry MacCracken, seventy-five-year-old retired cattle puncher, jumped up when a bandit told him to sit still, and "drilled" the bandit through the shoulder, is mildly interesting. It is more interesting to read that it happened in a "suburban liquor store" of Colorado, where MacCracken spends his time sitting by the stove, "whittling." To sit whittling by a liquor store stove seems a strange occupation for one seventy-five years old, who knows that time is whittling away his few remaining days.

The AAA asks congress for complete authority over all crops, all farm activities, and for $40,000,000 to $60,000,000 to move farmers from poor farms to better farms.

It is all benevolently planned, but many a farmer would prefer to stamp his foot and clap his hands in the old independent way.

The end of prohibition has not yielded all that was promised, and hoped for, in reform and in cash. Two-thirds of all the whisky sold is still bootleg whisky. That cheats Uncle Sam, and poisons many with bad whisky.

In big New York city, many went to hospitals after a "gay" New Year's eve. It is little consolation to know that the number of alcoholism cases was somewhat smaller than during prohibition years.

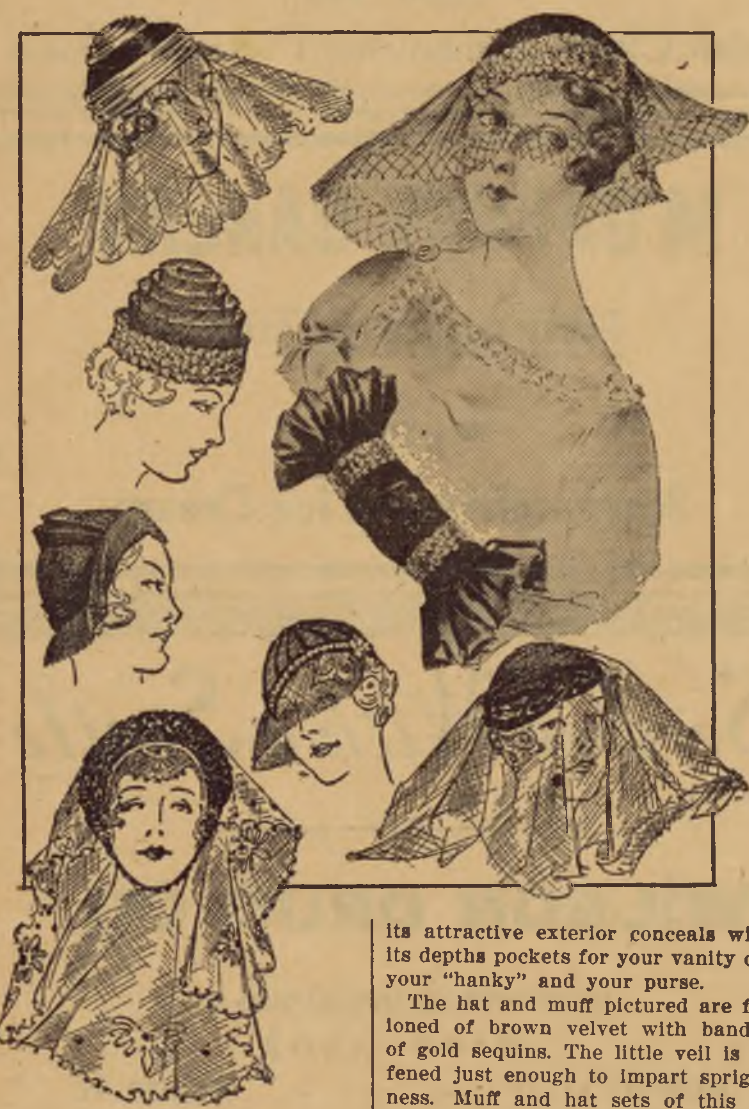
All-Important Little Dinner Hats

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



FROM the supreme court of fashion comes the ultimatum that with the formal dinner gown some sort of a flattering little hat must be worn. Likewise a prettily frivolous and feminine bit of headgear is an absolute necessity for wear during the cocktail hour, at the theater and for cafe dancing and other midwinter social events. So on with the dinner hat!

Just how might a dinner hat be defined? Well, for one thing it is ornamental if not useful. Yes, indeed, this whimsical little headpiece simply must add a truly decorative touch to the costume, which it does most dramatically this season. It may be created of most anything fine and fanciful, a wisp of tulle, a bandeau of glittering sequins or sparkling rhinestones with perhaps a dash of velvet or taffeta, satin or gleaming lame. Most important of all is a veil. By all means add a veil, a flirtatious veil, a cunning veil, a veil with a "come hither" look, a veil that flatters in that it accents your good points and conceals the others. In short, it must be a veil that crowns your head and hat with glory.

The illustration offers a few hints as to dinner hat trends. The fascinating little hat with a muff—of course, you sighted the muff at first glance, for it is so new, so chic and so charming it needs must attract attention. "Lucky muff," they call them, brings good fortune to the one wearing it, so the story goes in fashionland. A very versatile muff it is, too, for it is as practical and useful as it is pretty, since its attractive exterior conceals within its depths pockets for your vanity case, your "hanky" and your purse.

The hat and muff pictured are fashioned of brown velvet with bandings of gold sequins. The little veil is stiffened just enough to impart sprightliness. Muff and hat sets of this type made up of maline and flowers are ideal for bridesmaid wear.

The toque sketched in the upper left-hand corner is styled of taffeta and maline. Order it in black or any color of your choice. The scalloped edge about the large circular maline veil is a new feature this season. This model in sweet pea colorings makes a ravishing headdress for the bride's attendants.

Sketched immediately below is the new wrap-around turban, a type which is very smart for the matron. Erect folds of maline spiral around and around like a winding staircase to the very pinnacle of the crown. A banding of jet sequins encircles the headline.

A youthful off-the-face hat is next shown. The maline shape has a molded turn-back cuff with a flange of maline on the crown to give it height. Recurring folds of taffeta with tiny bows of the same form the trimming.

The picturesquely veiled hat in the lower left corner features the very smart Marina coronet, the same formed of intricately braided folds of black velvet. The veil is a huge circle with a cut-out in the center which slips over the crown and is then brought down under the chin in bridle effect.

Each of the remaining two hats work satin folds and maline together. The one is a jockey cap type with a wee stiffened eyebrow veil. The veil with the big beauty spot of black satin is one of fashion's latest novelties.

QUILTED TAFFETA

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Designers are doing many interesting things these days with quilted and stitched effects. It is not only that dresses and coats are trimmed with quilted collars, cuffs and belt, for the latest movement is for wraps which are all-over quilted. In the picture the coat which is styled with a flaring hemline and cape-sleeves according to latest fashion dictates, is made of quilted cerise taffeta. The dress is of the same taffeta minus the quilting.

Collars and Cuffs

New collars and cuffs show a fishnet effect, and another splendid idea—there is a wider assortment of collars to be had without the necessity of buying cuffs, too.

Dinner Gown

HAT BRIM SMALLER; BACK IS TURNED UP

Brimmed hats are still with us, but the brims are smaller and turned up in back, so as not to interfere with the sables and the silver fox.

Debutantes are going for the high-hat Cossack caps of corduroy and velveteen, with matching neckerchief or Ascot, to wear with dark winter suits and coats.

They are round, Russian effects, high-crowned and brimless, that have an undeniable dash.

Popular Afternoon Frock Is of Gray Waffle Crepe

Gray waffle crepe combined with navy taffeta is used to create a very smart formal afternoon frock. The navy blue taffeta forms the high waisted bodice which has a Pierrot collar shirred on a cord and fastens with a small knot at the back.

The ankle-length skirt of gray waffle crepe features a slit on the left side to just below the knee. A box coat of the crepe has wide and full three-quarter sleeves lined with navy taffeta. Gray suede pumps are worn with the dress.

Shades in Spring Hosiery Are Inspired by Cuisine

Fashion will turn to the cuisine for inspiration in the spring hosiery shades. Among the new colors will be "ice tea," "ice coffee," "egg nog," and "frappe." The first is a dark suntan, the second a medium suntan, the third a nude evening shade and the fourth a light neutral shade.

Since fabric colors will be bright for spring, hosiery tints will show a livelier quality.

Skirt Formula

Straight and narrow, slashed and slithering—this is the skirt formula for morning, afternoon and evening Lengths vary with hours.

MAKE CHANGES IN POULTRY HOUSES

Farmers Insulate the Walls and Ceilings.

By R. E. Cray, Extension Poultryman, Ohio State University.—WNU Service.

Farmers are looking to the comfort of their hens this winter. They find it pays. Egg production is more constant during the cold winter months. Many farmers have reduced the cubic content of their chicken houses, and others have installed heating systems to be used when the weather is so cold the water in the houses freezes.

False ceilings are installed to cut the cubic capacity of the houses. Some are made with wire netting above, in which straw is stuffed. Other farmers employ a good insulating material.

Because warm air rises, it is the roof that needs to be insulated. Some poultrymen also insulate the walls in their poultry houses, some with straw held in place by wire netting, others with commercial insulating material.

Still others go further, modifying the window arrangement by eliminating the bafflers formerly recommended and fitting all of the openings with glass windows or glass substitutes.

Poultrymen also are worrying less about damp floors in their poultry houses. Results recently announced by experiment stations point to temperature control as more important than keeping the house thoroughly dry.

When the temperature in the house becomes so cold that the water freezes in the drinking fountains, brooder stoves are recommended. The stove should be surrounded with wire netting to keep the litter away.

Incubator Eggs and Baby Chicks Subject to Codes

Even incubator eggs and baby chicks are subject to codes. The outstanding feature of the proposed 1935 hatchery code is the development of a national breeding and disease eradication program in the poultry industry of the United States. This program is under the direction of the secretary of agriculture.

The purpose of the code is to prevent unfair competitive practices and misleading and deceptive methods of advertising, and to promote the best interests of the industry in all possible ways. It is also aimed to aid workers in the hatcheries by specifying the hours of labor and wages. Also, an attempt is made to protect the buyer against misrepresentation and fraud.

Hatching Chicks

In the day to day operation of the incubator there is perhaps nothing more important than frequent and regular turning of the eggs. The more turning the better, at least up to four times in each 24 hours. Turning is more effective during the first half than during the latter half of the incubation period. This suggests that it should be begun early. It is considered sound practice to continue turning until the eggs begin to pip. One should not be in too much of a hurry to remove the chicks from the incubator. They should be given time to become thoroughly dry. Chilling at that time constitutes a serious handicap. If the hatch is good the moisture from hatching chicks may be enough to chill them.—Successful Farming.

Fish Oil Aids Production

Two years experimental work at the Dominion experimental farm, Scott, Sask., has shown that pilchard (fish) oil added at the rate of 2 per cent to the laying mash of equal parts by weight of oat chop, barley chop, bran, shorts and beef scrap, has increased egg production 31 per cent over the production from pullets fed the same mash without the oil. Cod liver oil, fed at the same rate, increased production 26 per cent. Where fish meal was used to replace beef scrap in the mash, the production remained practically constant and no objectionable flavor was detected in the eggs. When bran and shorts were replaced by ground whole wheat, production was increased by 3 per cent.

Sex of Wild Geese

The way to tell the difference between a male and female in wild geese is by the shape of the bird. The males are usually much larger than the females, longer necked, and coarser bodied. The male always keeps his head up higher than the female, and is usually "on guard" so far as protection to the flock is concerned. When the male and female mate in the spring the noise made by either one is of equal proportions. The markings are identical on both male and female.

Thin-Shelled Eggs

Produce eggs with thick shells by eliminating from the breeding pen each year all birds that lay thin-shelled eggs and feeding the layers plenty of oyster shells or other forms of calcium carbonate (the shell being composed largely of calcium carbonate) and plenty of vitamin D (such as is found in cod liver oil) or give the birds access to adequate sunlight, because a lack of vitamin D often results in thin-shelled eggs, says the Wisconsin Agriculturist.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted

by William Bruckart

National Debt

Washington.—Now that the President has laid before congress his request for the new appropriations, financial students are wondering more and more when the end of this government spending is to come. It will be remembered that Mr. Roosevelt said a year ago that the total public debt should not exceed $31,834,000,000 and that that figure should be reached around June 30, 1935. When it is considered that the present public debt exceeds $28,500,000,000, it becomes difficult to understand how the President will succeed in sticking to his original assertion to hold the national debt at the figure named.

The Treasury department has just released its annual report and this reveals an increase in the public debt of approximately six billion dollars since June 30, 1933, an eighteen months' record. It has made the total cost of the recovery spending program aggregate something over twelve billion dollars since January 1, 1931, when the spending spree really began. To make the vast amount more readily comprehensible, if you take the time to figure it out you will find that the government has been spending borrowed money at the rate of almost twenty-three thousand dollars a minute in the last four years. To illustrate further the magnitude of this sum a figure expert here has calculated that there has been about one billion minutes since the birth of Christ and, therefore, the federal government in the last four years has added about twelve dollars to the public debt for each of the minutes since Christ came on earth.

But to get back to the present plan, presentation of the budget with its maximum outlay of around seven billion dollars recalled to some leaders the assertion by the President respecting the topmost limit for the public debt. In the budget message which he presented just a year ago Mr. Roosevelt boldly stated his belief that "the government should seek to hold the public debt" to the figure of $31,834,000,000.

"Furthermore," he added, "the government during the balance of this calendar year should plan to bring its 1936 expenditures including recovery and relief within the revenues expected in the fiscal year 1936." The fiscal year 1936 begins next July 1. And frequent pronouncements from the White House have made it clear that a balanced budget in that time is quite unlikely. In addition, the treasury said in its annual report that taxes always lagged behind in reflecting recovery of the country. For example, income taxes to be paid on March 15, 1936, and in the subsequent installments of that year will be the result of levies on earnings of the current calendar year. No one expects earnings in 1935 to be normal. It is obvious, therefore, that the balancing of the budget in the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1935, becomes almost a physical impossibility unless the President should do the unexpected by cutting off every one of the sixty-five or more recovery and relief agencies and should cut off all federal funds for relief of the destitute. If that were done, it is estimated by fiscal experts that ordinary receipts by the treasury would come close to meeting the ordinary cost of the regularly established governmental agencies.

* * *

President's Views Change

There had been frequent contentions by avid New Dealers that Mr. Roosevelt's second budget recommendations would provide a clear picture of his general fiscal policies. If their statements remain true, they resulted in setting up one of the most paradoxical conditions in the history of this nation.

Looking back over the whole Roosevelt period, the thing which observers have never been able adequately to explain is who or what effected the change in the President's views on fundamental financial questions. It is too obvious to precipitate an argument that the President's views have changed. When one goes back to his first message to congress or beyond that to his campaign speeches and the platform upon which he made the race for the Presidency, it is futile to attempt to reconcile those utterances with the subsequent spending and borrowing program in which his administration has indulged. It will be recalled that Mr. Roosevelt declared in his inaugural speech an intention to balance the budget and wipe out the deficit left on his lap by the Hoover administration. He went on to say that if congress in its generosity voted sums that placed the budget out of balance it was under the necessity at the same time to provide taxes to raise the excess expenditures.

Since there can be no dispute that Mr. Roosevelt's views have changed and he has acted in accordance with his new found principles, the interesting thing is who brought about the revision of views on the part of the President. Some of the President's virulent critics have asserted in the opening days of congress that Mr. Roosevelt was wholly uninformed as to the needs with which he was confronted when he was making his campaign speeches. They say he found his original promise to be all wet and he took the only alternative to stave off a bitter row in his own party, offering much money for congress to spend.

Among the President's friends, I have heard private expressions that Mr. Roosevelt had been misled by some of the group who held his ear at the start of the administration. These men referred to a number of the so-called Progressive Republicans like the LaFollettes, Norris, Hiram Johnson of California, and Bronson Cutting of New Mexico. Several of these were so well liked by the President that they were invited to enter his cabinet. Consequently, there are those who believe that Mr. Roosevelt followed the advice of the Progressive Republican group much more closely than leaders among the old-time Democrats. Most of the Progressive Republicans are spenders at heart, according to the general view here. And they are also men who regard a balanced budget as not very important. So, while no one can say definitely what influences altered the President's stand, it certainly is regarded among observers here as being a situation in which the wind makes the straws point toward the so-called progressives as having joined hands with the President in initiating what has come to be the greatest outpouring of taxpayers' money, except in war time, since our government was established.

"South in the Saddle"

Organization of the new congress has resulted in a new cry, in reality a very old cry, but it is new, since we have not heard it in fifteen years. The cry we are hearing now from Republicans and from northern Democrats is the wail that "the South is in the saddle."

While there certainly can be nothing criminal about the South being in the saddle, it provides a grand political issue both within the Democratic ranks and between the Democratic party and what is left of the Republicans in congress. It also touches a question that has been discussed many times, namely, the wisdom of the seniority rule in congress. The seniority rule provides that the oldest members in the point of service shall inherit committee chairmanships and shall have other positions of honor in the house and senate.

Out of the 69 Democratic senators only 24 come from what is known as the solid South. Of the 317 Democratic members of the house, only about 100 are thoroughly acquainted with the yell of the Confederacy. Yet in the face of this tremendous growth of Democratic membership coming out of the North and the West, the South is in the saddle more solidly than ever.

The speakership of the house went to Representative Byrns of Tennessee, who succeeded to the place made vacant by the late Henry T. Rainey of Illinois. Mr. Byrns had been Democratic leader and his promotion left a vacancy to which Representative Will Bankhead of Alabama was elected, thus moving leadership further to the South. The only plum, if it be a plum, that went north of the Mason and Dixon line was the selection of Representative O'Connor of New York, as chairman of the rules committee.

In the senate we see Vice President Garner, the presiding officer, a Texan. The majority leader is Senator Robinson of Arkansas. The powerful committee on finance is presided over by Harrison of Mississippi; the senate committee on banking and currency is controlled by Fletcher of Florida; and the committee on agriculture is headed by Smith of South Carolina. One could go on and name many others although I believe the consensus is that the seniority rule has not worked to produce as many duds for senate committee chairmanships as has occurred in the house.

Checking Radicals

Democratic leaders in the house have made certain that they will not be embarrassed this year as they were in the first New Deal congress. In that session they were constantly harassed by the radicals who sought to force votes on legislation which the President and his advisers did not want and which for the same reason the Democratic leaders did not want. The radicals accomplished their purposes by use of what is called the rule of discharge of committees. But that rule has been amended so that to invoke it now, actually a majority of the house will have to sign a petition.

Under the previous rule, the signature of 145 members of the house was sufficient to compel the discharge of a committee from consideration of any piece of legislation referred to it for action. The necessary number of signatures was obtained in three embarrassing cases last year. The soldiers' bonus bill was brought out by that method; the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage inflation bill was released for a house vote in the same manner.

The new house organization, however, is determined not to be embarrassed in that manner. It succeeded in Democratic caucus—binding on all Democrats—in having the original rule amended so that now there must be a majority of all house members affixing their signatures to the discharge petition before it becomes operative.

SHELLS UNCOVER TREASURE

Gunners bombarding the eastern front during the World war had no idea that they were bringing to light archeological treasures. In the shell holes in Jugoslavia, members of an expedition sent out by Harvard university have found treasures which go back to the Bronze age. Nearly two thousand sites have been marked out as a result of the studies of this expedition. In them, future digging will take place. Incidentally, by making a 3,500-mile survey of the territory, the scientists have uncovered Roman roads and fortifications which before were thought only to exist in local legends.—Pearson's Weekly.

GREETINGS GOVERNOR GRAVES!

The inaugration of Gov. Bibb Graves Monday as the forty third governor of Alabama climaxes one of the most spectacular campaigns in the history of the state selected by the people of his state for the second time as their chief officer, Gov. Graves has done what no other governor in Alabama has ever done.

Ascending to the state's high chair, the new governor has imediately set himself earnestly to the problems which vex the state. His message to the Legislature indicates that he intends to deal with each problem vigorously and unevasively. The eyes of the state, and the nation for that matter, are upon Alabama's "Little Colonel" as he assumes leadership again of his people in these trying days.

Gov. Graves represents a progressive in the executive position; a man who knows the problems of his people, and who will eagerly attempt their solution. Each problem will be faced squarely, and the attempted solution will not be time worn, but efficient and progressive.

Most important is the attitude of the new chief in his campaign pledge that human welfare will come first in Alabama. This was to be expected of a man who gave this cause so much support in his first Administration. Nevertheless it does not lose its potency in the face of this fact, but rather heightens it, for this item needs the utmost support in our commonwealth at the present time. It would appear that the prime business of any type of government is the welfare of those who reside within its borders. To provide for the safety, well being and general welfare of these people is the duty of government. They must not be neglected in the rapid functioning of the wheels of government, for they indeed are the government, and it exists for them. It is refreshing in the program of Gov. Graves to note that this item which is so often taken for granted will receive ample consideration.

Gov. Graves bids fair to make a splendid record during his administration. A financial expert, a government specialist and a statesman, he will find ample fields for the exercise of his abilities in the governor's office. It is hoped that Alabama will rally behind this spendid leader, giving him the cooperation which is necessary for the launching of his program. Nothing short of a splendid, progressive and wholesome administration is the forecast of this paper.

PROHIBITION DRIVE

been repealed conditions have become unbearable. Safety lies in enforcing our laws.

"We believe the people of Alabama will never consent to increase the sale of intoxicants to her people in order to balance the state budget. We bebelive in the people of Ala. They will not debauch their children with strong drink in order to get revenue to educate them.

"Repeal of the 18th Amendment has deluged America with liquor. Every promise of the liquor lords has been broken. The old time solon has not returned but conditions many times worse are here with liquors sold everywhere. Drunkenness has multiplied many times. Liquors are sold to school children and minors. Death and accidents from drunken driving have alarmingly increased.

"Self preservation demands that we refuse to repeal our laws governing the manufacture, sale and distribution, of intoxicating liquors. We appeal to the people of Alabama not to repeal our statutes and bring upon us the danger and death that will surely come from automobile driving by moderate and immoderate drinking."

EDUCATION VIEWS

eral funds and relief workers have contributed.

County schools could esaily have paid off all debt and maintain a normal building program had their revenues been maintained at nomal It should be kept firmly in mind that the expenditures per child for education in Alabama in the best days was about one-third of the national average, Alabama ranking always among the lowest states. The disproportionate cuts suffered by education in panic days, and not any wild spending, left the schools prostrate and caused teachers to pay an unusual part in helping to put the state within its income.

3. It must be remembered that the Supreme Court of Alabama ruled offically that certain acts of the adminstration were illegal deversions of money from funds sacredly set apart for trust in school children. This decision stopped the use of school taxes for other purposes; but, before the decision could be had, education had lost forever several million dollars and a regular school year had been wrecked.

4. With reference to the tying up with future school revenue for school buildings and equipment, it should be noted that legislative enactment plainly and deliberately designated certain county and district taxes for this purpose; and it should be understood that school boards have no other way of providing buildings. The state appropriations are especially labeled in nearly all cases as 'teacher salary' funds; and the building load automatically falls upon these special county and district taxes provided for the purpose.

THE TIRE SENSATION OF '35

Sells on Sight!

TO SEE it is to buy it! That's the way extra value stands out in the new Firestone Century Progress Tire. We found out what car owners wanted most in a tire—then we gave it to them. Out of more than ten million visitors to the Firestone Factory at the World's Fair last year, we obtained this opinion: "Give us Blowout Protection, Non-Skid Safety, and Long Wear, at a Moderate Price."

That was a large order, and the price part of it was our biggest problem. We said to ourselves: "Surely, if millions of people could get the tire they wanted, they would BUY!" We could see volume production . . . resulting in unbelievably low prices — and savings for millions of car owners who wanted the safety, long wear, and dependability of a first quality tire, at a price that would permit them to replace not only one tire but all four tires.

So we built the greatest tire ever made to sell at these low prices. Then the wave of buying started—car owners from Coast to Coast bought — not just one or two tires — but complete sets!

Go to the Firestone Service Dealer or Service Store in your community TODAY! See the new Firestone Century Progress Tire—just look at the broad, husky shoulders, massive flat tread, deep-cut non-skid and Gum-Dipped cords. Did you ever see so much tire for so little money? WORLD WATCHES HAUPTMANN TRIAL

Millions Follow the Greatest Courtroom Drama of Modern History.

By W. C. WEBBER

Flemington, N. J.—This small American town holds the center of interest for the entire world as day by day the intense drama of the trial of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, charged with the murder of tiny Charles Lindbergh, son of the famous flyer, unfolds. Flemington, small New Jersey town of less than 3,000 population, is the focus of all eyes, as prosecution of the former German carpenter proceeds.

Batteries of brilliant opposing legal counsel, clicking telegraph instruments, flare of flashlights—all the accompaniments of a modern murder trial—have been unable to obscure the human element in this case and drag it down to the level of the usual sensational court case.

Mothers and fathers everywhere have followed with sympathetic interest each bit of testimony, the actions of the characters in this moving drama, and are weighing each scrap of evidence that is presented for and against this man who is charged with one of the most hideous crimes of modern times.

Supreme Court Justice Thomas W. Trenchard, presiding over the Hauptmann trial, has a reputation for sternness. His task is not easy as the state of New Jersey attempts to send an obscure little German carpenter to the electric chair for the murder of the Lindbergh baby. The interplay of human emotions often tends to make the administration of cold justice difficult.

Tells of Last Day.

Most pathetic figure of the drama is that of Mrs. Lindbergh, the former Anne Morrow. A slender figure in black, she told her story in a clear, small voice. Under the questioning of Attorney General David T. Wilentz, chief prosecutor, she told of the idyllic afternoon she spent with her son on the day he disappeared, of how she had gone for a walk and finally of the tragedy and the bewilderment of the kidnaping. She firmly identified the flannel shirt, the thumb guard, and the sleeping garment the child wore. At one point the tremendous emotional strain she was undergoing was indicated when she was unable to testify in answer to a question regarding the toys of her dead baby. She bowed her head silently, and the prosecutor passed on to another question.

Mrs. Lindbergh's eyes were filled with tears and her voice trembled with emotion. There were moments when she was obviously near the breaking point, but she went bravely on to relate the horrifying occurrence of that dramatic day, and concluded her testimony by identifying the clothing. What that ordeal must have cost her can only be conjectured.

Sees Hauptmann.

When she entered the courtroom it was the first time she had seen Hauptmann, the accused. Her eyes went to him repeatedly, but no expression crossed her face. Two chairs away from Mrs. Lindbergh sat Mrs. Hauptmann. Hauptmann's face disclosed no emotion, but was turned steadfastly toward the witness chair. He gave no indication of Mrs. Lindbergh's presence, but his wife became more nervous. She shifted in her chair and her head twitched as the mother told her story.

Colonel Lindbergh followed his wife on the stand. His testimony was direct and clearly given. He testified that he heard a noise "like the breaking of a crate"—supposedly when the kidnaper's ladder broke and killed the child as the criminal climbed down from the nursery. He did not realize at the time that it might have been a ladder breaking.

Near the close of his recital of the shocking crime came a sensational moment when Lindbergh identified Hauptmann as the man whom he believed to be guilty of kidnaping his son. He vigorously combated suggestions by the defense that members of his own household had been involved.

The fear and sorrow that swept over the house on Sourland mountain was revealed for the first time when Betty Gow, Scotch nurse, took the stand. She was the last person to see the child alive. In quick, staccato sentences she told how Colonel Lindbergh turned away from the empty nursery and looking into his wife's eyes said: "Anne, they've stolen our baby."

Nurse Collapses.

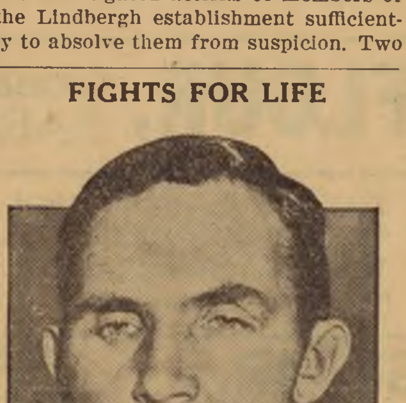
Sharp cross-examination which contained a hint that she was involved in the crime brought flashes of anger from the nursemaid. Most attempts on the part of the defense to pry into her private life were challenged by the prosecution and the court generally sustained the objection. She left the stand in a virtual collapse which at times caused her to sob hysterically.

This line of questioning was in line with statements of the defense counsel that the Lindbergh kidnaping was an inside job. Miss Gow's friendship with "Red" Johnson, since deported from this country for illegal entry, were referred to in the questioning. She admitted she told Johnson that the baby would be at Hopewell on the night of the kidnaping, but in answer to a direct question declared she had not told Hauptmann.

Miss Gow was accompanied in court the day she testified by Mrs. Elsie Whatley, widow of the Lindbergh butler, whose activities were mentioned several times during the testimony. The nurse said she had spent an hour in Mrs. Whatley's room the night of the kidnaping, and that during that time the baby was alone on the second floor of the house. When she discovered the baby was gone, she immediately notified the Lindberghs, she stated.

Defense Attorney Reilly's questioning has tended to show that police had not investigated actions of members of the Lindbergh establishment sufficiently to absolve them from suspicion. Two were particularly pointed out in the cross-examination: Betty Gow, and Oliver Whatley, butler, who later died in a hospital.

FIGHTS FOR LIFE



Bruno Hauptmann, German ex-carpenter, who is on trial on charges of murdering the Lindbergh baby. His stolid actions have amazed spectators.

Trooper Testifies.

An important witness in establishing details of the discovery that the child was missing was Corporal Joseph Wolfe of the New Jersey state police. Wolfe testified that he found the ransom note on the south window sill of the east wall. Traces of mud on a suitcase near the window were also discovered, Wolfe said. He identified the state's ransom note exhibit as the one he saw in its envelope the night of the kidnaping, and declared that as soon as Trooper Kelly arrived, they checked the note for fingerprints and found none.

Indentations in the earth beneath the window, evidently made by the ladder used in the case, were described by the trooper. He also was the one who while searching the grounds found the discarded kidnap ladder sixty or seventy feet from the house.

The stoical attitude of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, accused murderer, is that of an intensely interested spectator. This man whose arrest was the culmination of one of the longest searches in the annals of crime, watches proceedings of the trial with a detachment that is amazing. His impassive face tells nothing. He rarely stirs in court, rarely speaks. He might be simply one of the audience, for all the emotion he displays. He enters the courtroom as calmly as if he were paying a social call, instead of being on trial for his life.

Identifies Prisoner.

His composure was broken, however, when he was identified by two witnesses as having to do with the case. Joseph Perrone, New York taxi-driver, testified that Hauptmann was the man who had given him a note to be delivered to Dr. John F. Condon (Jafsie), intermediary in the negotiations with the kidnaper.

When Perrone stepped down from the witness stand, walked across the thirty feet that separated the witness chair from Hauptmann, and putting his hand on Hauptmann's shoulder, identified him as the man whose actions he had described, the prisoner gave his first sign of emotion.

"You're a liar," Hauptmann muttered in so low a tone that only those sitting close to him could hear.

His identification as a man whom he had seen in an automobile near the Lindbergh home on the day of the kidnaping by Amandus Hochmuth, eighty-seven-year-old Prussian army veteran, just previous to this, caused Hauptmann to only shake his head. The testimony of both Lindbergh and his wife had also failed to shake the composure of the accused man.

Testimony of Dr. J. F. Condon, the "Jafsie" of the ransom notes, another important figure in the case, is expected to have considerable weight with the jury. The retired educator conducted the ransom negotiations which resulted in payment of $50,000 which he alleges were made to Hauptmann. Condon is accompanied wherever he goes by Al Reich, a former pugilist who acts as a bodyguard. Reich was also with Condon on the night when they went to the Woodlawn cemetery where "Jafsie" established his contact with the extortioner, sitting in conversation with him for an hour on a park bench.

CHILD'S NURSE

Marked Contrast.

Condon positively identified Hauptmann as the person to whom he paid the ransom money. Attorney Reilly in cross-examining Condon, implied that the witness himself was one of the kidnap gang. Condon vigorously denied any such part, declaring that his only purpose was "to get back Colonel Lindbergh's baby."

Opposing counsel in this most interesting criminal case of modern times present a marked difference. David T. Wilentz, attorney general of New Jersey, who is directing the fight to send Hauptmann to the electric chair, is wiry, dapper, dark-eyed, olive skinned. He has not handled many criminal cases in his career and he has never before been prosecutor in a capital case. He has been thrust into a glare of publicity as brilliant as any lawyer could ask for, and appears calm and confident as to the final outcome of his efforts to convict the prisoner.

He has the support of five assistant attorney generals, of a former judge, George K. Large, and Anthony M. Hauck, Jr., present prosecutor of Hunterdon county.

In direct contrast to Wilentz is Edward Jay Reilly, chief of defense counsel. In his thirty years of practice he has tried, according to his own estimate, 2,000 murder cases, among them some of the most spectacular acquittals ever recorded in New York. His methods have become almost a legend among criminal lawyers. Florid, weighing 200 pounds, and a former army captain, he is entirely the opposite of his opponent. Reilly admits that he will receive no pay for his efforts on behalf of Hauptmann.

Associated with Reilly are C. Lloyd Fisher, a native of Flemington and defender of John Hughes Curtis, the Norfolk (Va.) shipbuilder who was convicted in 1932 of obstructing justice in the Lindbergh case; Egbert Rosecrans, defender twelve years ago in the "cat and swamp murder" cases, and Frederick A. Pope.

Meanwhile, millions watch the drama that is being played daily in the little town of Flemington, the little New Jersey town where the most sensational trial of modern times is being held.

Emotion and Law Never in Accord

Civilized Procedure Calls for Abstract, Swift Justice.

One of our readers writes to the column about the case of Bruno Hauptmann, the accused kidnaper of the Lindbergh baby.

"It makes my hair stand on end," she says, "to hear talk about whether the state really has a strong enough case to convict him, if there is enough evidence to get the death penalty, and so on. This man was found with the money gouged from the distraught parents of the poor baby who was murdered. Isn't that enough? I'd like to know if any of your other readers cares if he did it alone or had an accomplice, if he actually shot the baby dead, or if its death was an accident. I can't imagine any right-thinking person, any normal human being, quibbling as to the details of his part in the hideous crime. He was living on the fruits of it, and that's enough for me. As far as I'm concerned, I wouldn't waste the people's money on a trial for such fiends. It is just that farcical technicality and red tape in our courts that encourages criminals in their confidence they can beat justice. Tell me, is there any shred or ghost of a chance of a technicality saving this man from his just deserts?"

Pointing out inconsistencies in this emotional outburst, the newspaper writer to whom it was addressed answers as follows:

"I don't think that we need worry about Bruno Hauptmann cheating justice in his trial in New Jersey. But, while many of us will have the same emotional reaction to this case, we must remember the fundamental postulate upon which our law is founded; that is, that it is better to let ten guilty men escape than to punish one who is innocent. That is the reason for the legal technicalities in our courts—to give a man every possible protection until he is proved guilty. And we canot deny that it is the humane and civilized procedure, and that but for it many innocent people might have been unjustly punished. However, innocent or guilty, our reader's suggestion to dispense with this man's trial is nothing more nor less than meeting lawlessness with lawlessness. And it requires very little thought to realize where that would lead us.

"The mention of red tape in our courts encouraging criminals brings up an interesting point with which our best criminologists have long concerned themselves. They tell us that offenders are not afraid of severe penalties—that is, in communities where more crimes have been made punishable by execution, the crimes have not decreased. It is the certainty of punishment, though this is less severe in nature, that deters criminals. As an example we are given Canada, where there is so much less serious crime than in our own country. Canadian law is no less just than ours, in fact it is upon the English common law that both are based. They are no less eager than we to protect the innocent. But in Canada there is more certainty of punishment—because they do not countenance our cumbersome processes and delays. It is not uncommon there to have a criminal arrested, tried, and on his way to prison within a few days.

"We must fairly and justly and openly try those accused of crime. But it would certainly be an improvement on our present methods if we could take a leaf from the book of Canada and make justice more direct and swift without possibility of interference with the certainty of punishment once guilt is established."

A Doctor Knows!

And doctors use a liquid laxative

"Leave the rest to nature"

There's a very good reason why doctors and hospitals have always used liquid laxatives! You'd use a liquid, too, if you knew how much better it makes you feel.

A liquid laxative can always be taken in the right amount. You can gradually reduce the dose. Reduced dosage is the secret of real and safe relief from constipation.

Just ask your own doctor about this. Ask your druggist how popular liquid laxatives have become. The right liquid laxative gives the right kind of help, and the right amount of help. When the dose is repeated, instead of more each time, you take less. Until the bowels are moving regularly and thoroughly without any help at all.

People who have experienced this comfort, never return to any form of help that can't be regulated! The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara, and these are natural laxatives that form no habit — even in children. Its action is gentle, but sure. It will relieve a condition of biliousness or sluggishness without upset. It's the ideal family laxative because it's a family doctor's prescription, and perfectly safe and effective for family use.

If you are seeking something that will relieve your occasional upsets safely and comfortably, try Syrup Pepsin. Give regulated doses until Nature restores regularity.

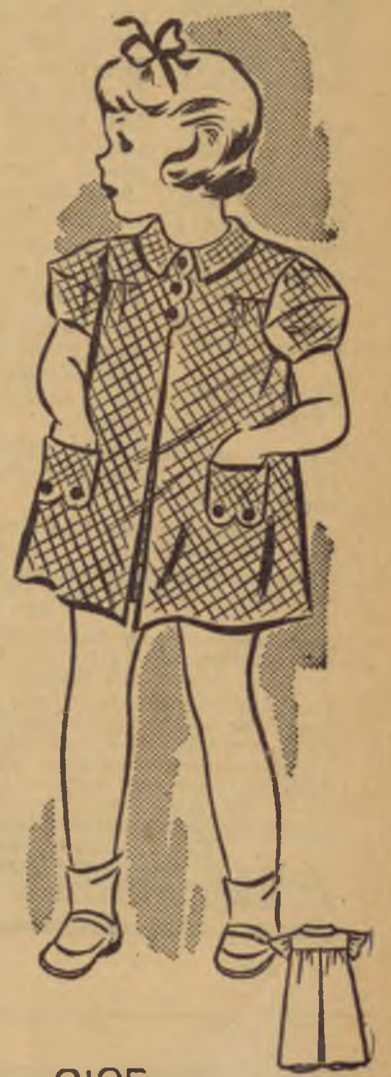
PATTERN 9195



Little Miss Molly here can hardly wait to run outside to show her brother Tommy that even though she is "only a girl," she has pockets, too. And she thinks they're nicer than his—scalloped and buttoned the way they are, and plenty jaunty. She's also more than proud of the way she manages to dress herself in this pretty bloomer frock. Three front buttons to fasten—there, it's all done! And her mother likes those cunning puffed sleeves and the long inverted pleat, back and front. For those who prefer them, simple cap sleeves like those in the smaller sketch may be made by omitting the lower part of the sleeve.

Pattern 9195 may be ordered only in sizes 2, 4, 6 and 8. Size 6 requires 2⅝ yards 36 inch fabric.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

New Tire Bites Into Mud and Snow

Rugged in appearance and vastly different in traction and riding comfort from any tire of the past, this new "mud and snow" tire brings safe, dependable travel for motorists under even the most adverse road conditions of winter. Developed by Firestone Tire & Rubber Company engineers, the scientific design provides easy steering, maximum traction in snow or mud, and smooth riding on paved streets and highways. This tire is ideal for motorists who drive over unimproved roads part of the time, especially in winter. For the driver who wants maximum protection against skidding in city or country, the new tire has many advantages over chains, in riding comfort and in protection from side slips. Greater traction pulls it through mud holes and snow drifts. This tire is of heavy duty construction, and is made in passenger car sizes only.

I submit respectfully that boards of education have exercised their powers in creating debts for buildings most moderately and cautiously when they have tied up no more than four months' revenue even as now reduced. The records of education boards, admitting one or two very unwise exception, will bear the most scrupulous comparison with those of city commissions, boards of the revenue, and other governmental agencies; and such a comparison would bring a new public esteem for the citizens who serve on such boards.

VOLUME 2 NUMBER 44 MONTEVALLO, ALABAMA. FRIDAY JAN.25, 1935, SUBSCRIPTION $1.50 PER YEAR

DOWLING GIVES VIEWS ABOUT SCHOOL FUNDS

"If the school revenue were increased 3 1-2 cents per pupil per day each of Alabama's 650,000 school children would be guaranteed a normal term", H. G. Dowling, president of the Albam Education Association, said in Tuscaloosa Saturday.

Mr, Dowling was discussing a statement of the increase in the school load and the decrease of school money as given out last week by Dr. E. L. Morphet, of the State Department of Education, in Mont gomery.

According to this statement the school load increase is 7.4 per cent since 1929-1930. Reports from all section of the state indicate a substantial increase in attendance again this year. It seems safe to assume that the attendnace for the current year will be at least 10 per cent greater than in 1929-1930.

On the contrary, school receipts for last year were $5,107,000 less than for 1929-1930, the year preceding the onslaught of the depression This loss is divided into $2,138,533 state money, and $2,969,094 local money.

"The loss in local money", explained Mr. Dowling "is a fact of special importance, and indicates the tremendous drop in property assessments since practically all the local school revenue is derived from the county-wide and dictrict property tax. When to this loss he continued, "is added the loss in the state public school fund, also derived from the property tax, the total loss from this source is approximately $3,500,000. Evidently Alabama must follow the example set by other states in providing a larger per cent of school money from the state treasury than it has here-to-fore".

College Night has been an outstanding event on the campus since 1921. Last year more than 1,500 attended each presentation of the program. Two full performances will again be given in order to accomodate the visitors expected.

World Court Adherence Proposal Sidetracked in Senate—President's Social Security Plan Arouses Storm of Discussion.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

RATIFICATION of the world court protocols received a setback when Senator Hiram Johnson, Republican, California, bitterly denounced such action as a "back door entry" to the League of Nations, and senate leaders rather than risk an immediate vote, delayed definite action.

Sen. Hiram Johnson

Senator Johnson's attack came on the heels of a special message to the senate from President Roosevelt who asked for early ratification of the protocols. It was the most determined movement yet made to put the United States into the court.

Other senators, it is said, were ready to follow Johnson's lead, particularly Senator Borah, long time foe of the court.

Johnson supported his opening attack on the court by offering four embarrassing reservations to the resolution of ratification:

1. Prohibit the court from entertaining jurisdication on any question relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs.
2. Permit recourse to the court only by agreement through general or special treaties between the parties in dispute.
3. Prohibit the court and the league of nations from trying to assume jurisdiction on any question which depends upon or relates to the Monroe Doctrine.
4. Declare the United States, by joining the court, assumes no obligations.

Through Johnson's action, these questions must be voted upon before a final vote can be reached on the resolution of adherence.

Although the question has been sidetracked for a time, it will be brought up soon, it is said, and Senator Robinson, Democratic leader, has stated that he was confident of ratification when the final test comes.

THE third phase of testimony presented by the state in the trial of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, charged with the murder of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh's son, has begun. Eight handwriting experts called by the prosecution have completed their testimony, each declaring that in his opinion, the dour ex-carpenter was author of the ransom notes, and the state now moves on to the story of finding the tiny corpse in a shallow grave in the woods near Hopewell, N. J., two months and twelve days after the kidnaping on the night of March 1, 1932. Following this, the story of how Hauptmann was captured last September through identification of one of the gold certificates which made up the ransom, will be told.

Eight men, who have qualified with the court as experts, have declared that Hauptmann penned the ransom notes. Photographic enlargements of the notes and of Hauptmann's admitted writings have been shown in the court, and each peculiarity of each character has been carefully gone over.

Defense lawyers have fought each scrap of testimony bit by bit. An attempt has been made to show that some one might have forged Hauptmann's handwriting in an effort to throw suspicion on him, but this has been vigorously refuted by witnesses who have been firm in their assertions that only the prisoner could have been the author.

An attempt to forestall efforts of the defense to pin the crime on Isador Fisch, furrier, who died in Germany, is being made by New Jersey officials. Pinkus Fisch, brother of Isador, his wife, Czerna; his sister, Hannah, and Fisch's nurse, Minne Steingnitz, have been brought from Germany to testify. Pinkus has asserted his belief that his brother is not guilty.

THE Saar will be returned to Germany on March 1, a special committee of the League of Nations has decided. The proposal will be submitted to Berlin at once. Opposition to this proposal is expected, since the reich originally demanded the basin's return formally on or before February 15.

Another difficulty arises over France's demand that Article 42 of the Versailles treaty establishing a demilitarized zone should be applied to the Saarland. This would ban Nazi storm troops and Brown Shirts from the territory after its return. Compliance of this demand would be an admission from Germany that the Brown Shirts are a semi-military organization, and this Berlin has long denied in computing her military strength.

Germany won an overwhelming victory in the plebiscite held to determine the wishes of the inhabitants of the rich Saar basin as to the future status of that territory. The complete vote as announced by the commission was: for return to Germany 477,119, for annexation to France 2,124, and to return to present status under League of Nations control 46,513. Their margin of victory exceeded the hopes of even the most optimistic Nazi leaders.

Love of the fatherland won over antipathy to Hitler principles in influencing the voters. The Saarlanders in voting to return to reich rule exchange their personal and political liberties for the regimentation of a dictatorship with its curb on the press, free speech and individualism.

GENERAL REVISION of air mail rates to prevent possible destruction of commercial aviation has been recommended by the bureau of air mail of the Interstate Commerce commission. An investigation conducted by the bureau discloses that most of the routes are being operated at substantial losses, and rate increases were recommended on 19 routes. Rates on one route would remain unchanged, and 11 others would be decreased, if the recommendations are carried out.

The proposed new increases range up from nine cents per mile for poundage not to exceed 300 pounds per mile, while the reductions ranged as high as 13.5 cents per mile. Operation losses of $1,757, 993.39 were shown in tables submitted by the 31 existing operating companies, and it was pointed out that the industry would be endangered if the contractors were forced to continue operating at tremendous losses.

THE most far-flung innovation the New Deal has proposed thus far—the "social security plan" proposed by President Roosevelt—has aroused a storm of discussion. Administration adherents greeted the scheme with wild enthusiasm, while the opposition, led by Senator Borah, Idaho, has voiced vigorous criticisms.

President Roosevelt

All business in congress has been sidetracked to permit immediate action on the proposed measure. Public hearings have already been started in the senate finance committee, and the house ways and means committee has postponed consideration of the bonus bill to work on the security plan. This is being done at the President's behest. The plan provides:

Flexible, but compulsory unemployment insurance under a federal-state system restricted to workers and financed by a 3 per cent tax on pay rolls after January 1, 1938. The government will aid in bearing administration costs, and the treasury will handle the fund. Ninety per cent of the pay roll tax is to be refunded to employers who contributed to state unemployment plans. A maximum of $15 a week of compensation to begin four weeks after the worker loses his job and to last for not more than sixteen weeks is contemplated.

The second part of the plan provides for old-age pensions. The government is to co-operate with the states and pay a maximum of $30 a month to persons over sixty-five. The national government is also to aid states in formulating a plan for persons under sixty-five which will be financed jointly by employer and employee through a pay roll tax; the funds to be handled by the federal government; the amount of pensions to be a percentage of the employee's wage; with non-manual employees receiving more than $250 a month to be exempt from the plan.

The third section of the scheme provides for appropriations to give better facilities to caring for mothers, and dependent and crippled children, and the fourth section would furnish larger appropriations for public health aid, investigation and research.

Cost of the entire program to the federal government will be $100,000,000 next year and $200,000,000 in succeeding years. The cost to the states will be $75,000,000 next year and $150,000,000 in succeeding years. Some idea of the size of the plan may be gained from the report of the President's cabinet which said reserves for old-age pensions must be maintained after some years at $15,250,000,000.

ONE of the most spectacular prison breaks in history was effected when four convicts in the San Quentin (Calif.) state prison overpowered two guards, slugged the warden unconscious, kidnaped six hostages including four members of the state prison board, and fled in a state owned automobile. The felons were captured two hours later 54 miles from the prison after a running gun fight wth prison guards and posses. One of the convicts was wounded, as were two of the hostages.

Trouble has been expected at San Quentin, where some 6,000 prisoners are housed in space designed for only 3,000. Unrest has been evident for some time, especially since it became necessary to put more than one man in each cell. Only 190 guards have been regularly employed.

EXTENSION of life of the Reconstruction Finance corporation for two years will be asked, informed congressmen assert. The RFC's authority to make loans expires on January 31. It is rumored that the extension will include a proviso permitting the President to put the organization out of business by proclaiming the emergency ended at the conclusion of one year.

The extension plan may also carry a section doubling the length of time for maturity of loans the RFC may make. The present limit is five years. It is also said that the RFC may be permitted to extend instead of renew existing loans providing value of security is unchanged.

THE final fate of NRA seems to be up to the President. Reports from the capital say the National Industrial Recovery board, successor to Gen. Hugh Johnson, who asserts NRA is "as extinct as the dodo," has avoided a direct recommendation that the institution be made permanent. Since this was evidently done with the approval of the President, the future of the Blue Eagle seems to be somewhat clouded.

Donald Richberg

The board, of which Donald Richberg is chairman, pointed out three possible courses which the President can follow. The first course would be to make NRA permanent, but in simplified form. Under this plan, every industry would have to go under a code fixing wage and hour limits and prohibiting child labor. Trade practice provisions would be entirely voluntary. In rare cases where price fixing is employed, the government, not the industry, would fix the price.

The second course would be to extend the NRA as it now stands, but for a limited period. Unless legislation of this kind is enacted, the act will expire automatically on June 16. The third course would amend and extend the NRA.

Most members of the board, it is said, prefer the "permanent" plan which would broaden the government's regulation of business. No industry would escape the wage and hour codes. Today many industries, among them the telephone, telegraph, and tobacco industries, are not under trade codes, since these have not been able to agree on terms. The present law permits the President to impose a code only when an industry refuses to submit voluntarily, such as in the case of the cotton garment industry.

Observers are not at all sure the President wants a permanent code. Several uncertainties have made it difficult for the President to decide, one of which is the status of section 7a, the collective bargaining clause.

A NUMBER of important issues await the League of Nations as it convenes at Geneva on its fifteenth birthday. Five major disputes will come before the body, of which the Saar plebiscite, involving as it does the disposition of the future national allegiance of that rich territory, holds most immediate interest.

Other decisions which await action of the league include: the dispute between Iraq and Persia over alleged border violations by the latter; the border conflict between Italy and Ethiopia; the Greek complaint that Greek minorities in Albania are being deprived of their guaranteed rights; and the long war in the Chaco Boreal between Bolivia and Paraguay.

FIRST legislation to be put through the house of representatives was completed as the $779,916,000 independent offices appropriation bill was passed in virtually the same form as recommended by the appropriations committee. The amount for the securities and exchange commission was increased to $2,000,000. Efforts of Representative Blanton of Texas to reduce the $264,043 for the home loan bank board and of Representative Taber, New York, to cut down the appropriation for the federal communications commission were defeated.

Signs of gathering storms were seen, however, as Representative Rayburn, Democrat, Texas, chairman of the house interstate commerce committee, declared on the floor that he would not support a bill to place production of oil under government control. Emergency legislation to supplant control measures invalidated by the recent decision of the United States Supreme court will undoubtedly be proposed, and Rayburn's declaration is seen as an indication that opposition may develop.

SWEDEN, apparently, has found a way to beat the depression. King Gustave in his annual message to parliament, reported that solution of the problem of unemployment appears near, the budget is balanced without new taxes having been imposed or new loans floated, and the national debt will be reduced this year. Only 60,000,000 kroner (about $15,000,000) has been asked for unemployment relief, as compared to 160,000,000 kroner last year.

IMPROVED conditions among corn belt farmers are indicated by a federal report which shows a gain of $82,989,592, or more than 30 cents a bushel for each borrower, has been realized by farmers in 10 states who availed themselves of the government 45-cent corn loans. Only slightly more than $500,000 of the $120,492,259 remains unpaid. About 18,000,000 bushels are under seal under the new 55-cent price, report states.

Budget Starts Controversy

Washington. — Out of President Roosevelt's eight-billion-dollar budget is developing a very real controversy which runs to the heart of the New Deal. True, this controversy like nearly all of the others will not result in changing the President's plans, but it seems to me to be a matter which justifies consideration even though the Roosevelt will in the end must prevail.

Included in the budget was provision for an appropriation of four billion dollars and, as stated by the President, to be supplied "in one sum, subject to allocation by the Executive principally for giving work to those unemployed on the relief rolls." Beyond that, there was no exposition of its intended use nor has there been any detailed statement of the plan. As a result, there is a considerable body of opinion in the halls of congress which is saying in effect that Mr. Roosevelt ought to define his work relief program. He has not done so, and the best information I can obtain is that no explanation may be expected in the near future; he intends to proceed as he has in the past by developing a program piece-meal and using the funds as the occasion requires.

In the critical days of 1933 when Mr. Roosevelt took office, I believe it was generally conceded that the emergency was so serious as to warrant delegation by congress of almost any power even remotely desired by the President. He used that power during 1933 and 1934. Now, many members of the house and senate believe that the time has arrived for congress to become more inquisitive about the expenditure of taxpayers' money and to avoid following in blind trust however the President may direct. While it is probable that congress will not be told how the President intends to use the money and while it is also probable that the requested appropriation of four billion dollars will be rubber stamped, the fact remains that at no time during the New Deal has there been such a buzz of discontent in the President's own list of wheel-horses. Senator Byrnes, the South Carolina Democrat who has been looked upon consistently as Mr. Roosevelt's spokesman on financial affairs in the senate, has informed that body that it is impossible "to be more specific at this time" on the work relief program. Senator Byrnes will go no further. He has given no interviews respecting his own thoughts on the matter and apparently has elected to wait at bat until the President tosses him the ball. Nevertheless, there are some senators who think they detect just a trace of concern in the attitude of this administration spokesman and they are wondering how long he will continue to repress his known energies.

Critics Chide President

Presentation of the budget was expected in many quarters to disclose the means by which the President hoped to get employment going again in private industry. It showed nothing tangible in this direction. Consequently, critics of the administration who have had opportunity to speak in the house and senate have begun to chide the administration on its third experiment in three years. Representative Snell of New York, Republican leader in the house, has called attention to the situation something in this manner: The President tried out one plan in 1933; he tried out a second plan in 1934, and now he is trying a third experiment. The first two were found to be all wet, and the Republicans, it seems, are convinced that the current effort has two strikes on it before it gets started. They are predicting failure for it in every way except the success that is assured in getting rid of money which the treasury is borrowing. Their conversations all have the same theme song, namely that the country is seeing activity, but they are not predicting how long this action can continue until the nation goes broke.

Whether the business leaders who met at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., a month ago were right or wrong in proposing the use of a dole instead of the more expensive work relief plan, or whether they were correct in any of the other recommendations they made, the truth is the administration has rejected without comment every single one of the recommendations made by that group. Mr. Roosevelt made no mention in his budget message or in his annual message to congress of plans for balancing the budget, and this fact at last has sunk in. The result is additional fear on the part of many business leaders who can see in the future only inflation and economic chaos for the country.

Privately, I have heard many expressions indicating that men of wealth are putting their money into tangible property—something that will not dry up and blow away. That is always the refuge of individuals who fear that the currency which their government controls is losing its worth. These men will be criticized for that course, naturally enough, by blind followers of inflation plans.

From all of the signs now visible and from the undercurrent of mumbling that I hear, it certainly is made to appear that Mr. Roosevelt is confronted with a necessity for some definite outline of his plans and an assurance that he will adhere to those plans. Without such, the situation assuredly is that he will not have the confidence of the business structure. It seems illogical even to suppose that he can gain the co-operation of business in expanding its activities, thereby re-employing workers, unless he takes a different tack than his pronouncements thus far indicate. At least, such is the conclusion of a vast number of thinking people.

Night Flying

I heard a visitor to Washington say the other day that he would like to ride airplanes, "but the confounded things fly most of their schedules at night."

The individual is a man of great wealth and his time is of great value. He insisted he was sincere in his statement that he would much rather save time by flying if the planes were on day-light schedule.

The statement aroused my curiosity to the extent that I conducted some inquiry into the situation. I found the night schedules of the air lines to be due to the fact that they are fixed by the Post Office department. If a line desires to carry mail it has to subject itself to the dictates of "Big Jim" Farley, the postmaster general. His office can and does say to an air line that it will fly a ship leaving New York at 9 p. m. or else it does not get the mail contract. The result is that the plane leaves New York at 9 p. m. or it leaves Chicago or Washington or any other city on a time stated by the Post Office department.

Many persons feel that such a policy is taking undue advantage of private industry. It is true that the Post Office department is paying for carrying the mails at a rate probably well above the rate it receives in postage on that mail. It is, therefore, a subsidy. But this government has for years maintained a policy of subsidizing new industries and that course is responsible for the success attained by the development of the transportation systems of this country.

The President's special commission named to study the airplane problems of this country and to make recommendations heard much testimony and received much data showing that the airplane industry in the United States had placed this country in the number one position in the air among all nations of the world. Individual members of that commission have stated they regard this as highly beneficial. Some of them at least maintain that development of an air industry was one of the greatest steps taken in national defense preparation. They appeared to consider this one end as justifying the course without even considering the maintenance of a great industry within the borders of our nation as a commercial unit.

But while this has been going on, and while many authorities on economic matters continue to urge development of the air industry, we find another agency within the government placing handicaps on that same segment of the economic structure. The least that can be said is that the courses cannot be reconciled.

The Oil Case

The administration is determined to control oil production. If it cannot do so by Executive order—and the Supreme Court of the United States has decreed it cannot do so in that manner—there will be laws predicated upon the interstate commerce clauses of the Constitution which will permit the executive branch of the government to keep its hand on the valve of oil wells.

President Roosevelt apparently was not much concerned over the Supreme court decision which invalidated that part of the recovery act, giving the Chief Executive authority to allow or prohibit interstate movement of oil as it decided best. The President appeared to feel, in responding to questions by news correspondents, that the rebuff was only temporary. He announced at that time a determination to control oil production in one way or another to avoid what he describes as a criminal waste of a great natural resource.

The oil case, the Supreme court decided, had its origin in regulations and executive orders issued under what the administration believed to be authority accorded by the recovery act. Those regulations and orders prescribed quotas allowed to be shipped from each of the several oil producing states. The motivating spirit was a desire to avoid accumulation of a vast surplus of crude oil with the consequent depressing of prices until crude oil was worth little or nothing. But, like many other prohibitory laws and rules of conduct, individuals resented being told they could not do a certain thing and immediately began to devise ways by which it could be done—a characteristic that was developed to its fullest during the bootleg days of national prohibition. The oil that was moved surreptiously came to be known as "hot oil," and the controversy over the validity of the regulations and executive orders consequently was called the "hot oil" case.

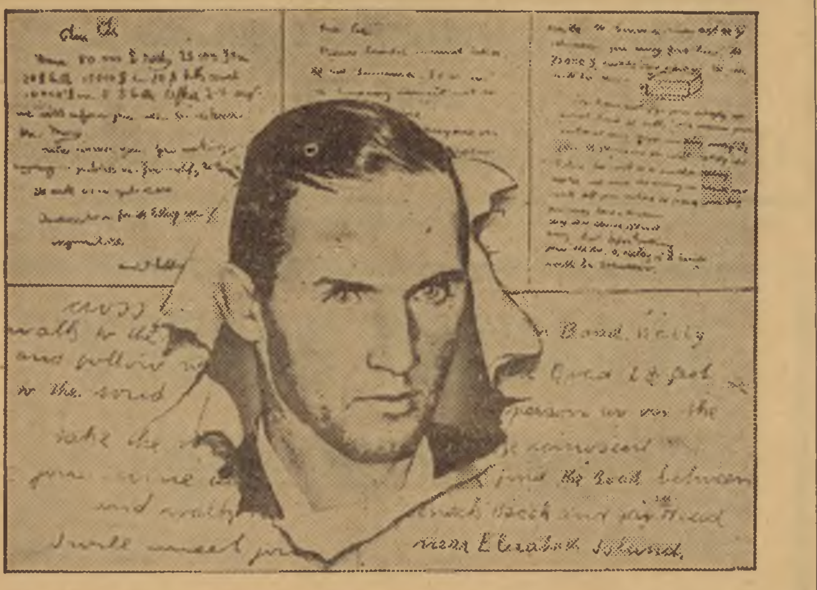
Ransom Notes May Be Death Warrant



These ransom notes may prove the death warrant of Bruno Hauptmann, accused of the murder of Baby Charles Lindbergh. In the upper left-hand corner is one of the initial demands made on Colonel Lindbergh. In upper center is shown the first note to "Jafsie," while in the upper right is the note telling how the money was to be tied up. The lower left shows the note telling where to leave the money, and at the right is the false note declaring the baby was still alive.

EXPERTS ANALYZE KIDNAPER'S NOTES

Compare Handwriting With That of Hauptmann.

By W. C. WEBBER

FLEMINGTON, N. J.—Such seemingly innocent trivialities as failure to dot an "i," cross a "t," the slant of a letter, a hyphen, may prove a deciding factor in sending a man to the electric chair convicted of the crime of murdering little Charles Lindbergh, son of the famous aviator. Those tiny, individual characteristics, which handwriting experts assert are ineradicable in each person's writing, are being fought over point by point, curve by curve, as the state introduces what some observers claim is strong evidence that Bruno Richard Hauptmann, Bronx ex-carpenter, was author of the notes which resulted in payment of the $50,000 ransom money by Dr. J. F. 'Jafsie" Condon.

Huge photostatic enlargements of certain words and letters from the ransom letters and from Hauptmann's admitted writings have been hung in the courtroom for the information of the jury. The sheets, each 6 feet in height and 4 feet in width have been tacked to the wall behind the witness chair where the kidnaper's ladder had rested earlier in the trial. The admitted writings and the disputed writings are shown in parallel columns marked "Hauptmann writing" and "ransom notes.

Albert S. Osborn, seventy-six years old and silvery-haired, testified in a clear, resonant voice that it was his opinion the ransom notes were all written by the writer of the various papers signed by Richard Hauptmann, and that all fourteen of the ransom notes were written by the same writer.

Osborn was positive in his statement that Hauptmann penned the notes. The expert proved a good witness, despite his deafness which forced attorneys to speak very loudly when addressing him. He identified himself as an expert in 39 states and in Canada and England, and is the author of two books on the subject of handwriting. In several verbal exchanges with defense attorneys he proved himself more than a match.

In explaining his comparison, Osborn gave an exposition on the general basis for comparison of handwritings. Characteristics in handwriting, he said, are the same as the characteristics of any thing else. There are many things by which handwriting might be identified exactly as a man, or an automobile or a horse is identified, by general description, and then by individual marks and scars and by characteristics which in combination make it apparent that they are not the result of accident, he continued.

When pupils learn the same system of writing, if they learn to write perfectly, one writing cannot be distinguished from another, but that does not occur, Osborn pointed out. Writing, he said, begins as an acquired qualification, it is an acquired habit first imitating the forms, and then the forms become more easily made, until finally writing becomes succession of habitual motions. Certain identical habitual motions were to be seen in both the writing on the ransom notes and the accepted writing done by Hauptmann, Osborn declared.

The letter "x" was pointed out at the start. Mr. Osborn showed that it was a clear, open "x," looking more like "ee," and that it wasn't an "x" at all. The "t," he testified, showed decided German characteristics, as did the letters "h" and "a." Hauptmann had a peculiar habit of finishing words in an awkward way with strokes that are too long, Osborn said, and also used a hyphen between the two words in "New York." In the ransom notes, he said, he found only three of the 391 "t's" were crossed, and the same was true of a "very large number" of the samples Hauptmann wrote for the police. Only seven of the small "i's" in the ransom notes were dotted, and the same proportion held true in Hauptmann's admitted writing, Osborn continued, and several sheets did not have a dotted "i" at all.

Another instance of similarity which Osborn pointed out to the jury was a hyphen used between the two words in "New York." A specimen taken from the writing that was on the sleeping suit wrapper was pointed out as having this characteristic. A photostatic copy of Hauptmann's writing on one of the automobile registrations was then shown by Osborn to have this same name hyphenated.

Other words pointed out by the expert as showing examples of broken English and German spellings in both sets of writings were: "auer" for "our," "aus" for "us," Wy" for "wy," "note" for "not," "gute" for "good," "ingore" for "ignore," "singatnre" for "signature" and "hte" for "the."

The expert testified that he had examined about a hundred samples of hand writing which had been brought to him by New Jersey police and federal agents. Among these, he said, were samples of writing by Isadore Fisch, German furrier, who, the state contends, was actually the abductor of the baby. Fisch died later in Germany.

Fisch continues to loom in the background as the defense's chief reliance. In suggesting that Fisch wrote the ransom notes, a spokesman for the prosecution declares that this line of defense will not avail, since it does not take the eye of an expert to see the utter dissimilarity between the neat, flourishing penmanship of Fisch and the scrawl of the ransom notes. It is understood from those who have samples of Fisch's handwriting in their possession that his hand was that of a man who took pride in his penmanship, forming his letters neatly and correctly and dotting all I's and crossing all T's.

The defense has maintained that Fisch is the actual receiver of the ransom money, that it was he who kidnaped the child, and Hauptmann was his wholly unconscious dupe. Hauptmann has declared that he was associated with Fisch in the fur trade and that he loaned Fisch $7,500 and that Fisch left with him a package which only a few weeks before his arrest, Hauptmann discovered to be the ransom money, the bulk of which was found in his garage. The state holds it can prove that ransom notes were circulated by him many months earlier than last summer, or even last spring.

Reilly attempted to show that too few handwriting exhibits had been brought into the courtroom, then opened up a line of questioning designed to force Osborn to admit that a Scandinavian could have written the ransom notes. The expert said there was an essential difference between German and Scandinavian script.

Some connection was seen between this line of questioning and that of Reilly when Betty Gow, the baby's nurse, was on the stand, with reference to "Red" Johnson, Norwegian sailor, whom she admitted having told of activities of the Lindbergh household on the day the kidnaping occurred.

Another handwriting expert whose testimony has been unshaken under questioning of Reilly is Elbridge W. Stein, who said he had testified in the recent Vanderbilt case in New York as well as the Wendel and Ridley cases. Stein said he had first studied the ransom notes and request writings of Hauptmann in July, 1932, and declared it was his opinion that the same man, Hauptmann, wrote both. He admitted there were differences, but insisted that there were similarities between the spelling in the two sets of writing. Charts and photographs of words taken from the ransom notes and the other writings done by Hauptmann were produced by Stein in support of his statements.

As the hearing progresses, Hauptmann appears to have lost much of the calmness which marked his first appearance in court. The stolidity of the ex-carpenter which was so remarkable when he was identified by both Colonel Lindbergh and Dr. J. F. Condon is not so apparent. Emotions show in his face, although even close watchers admit there has been no sign of fear or alarm among them. Occasionally he talks to his wife in a low voice.

The accused continues to follow each word of the trial with deep interest. He appeared especially interested in the handwriting testimony, craning his neck to see as the expert pointed out on the large chart the similarities between his own and the ransom writing. Colonel Lindbergh, who has been attending all the court sessions, was also absorbed as the experts gave their testimony

One Thing Important
Paid for Not Doing
$40 a Month
What Do We Want of Japan?

One piece of news in the world is important to the United States. If Washington doesn't know it, the governments of Europe and Asia do know it.

That news is Amelia Earhart's flight, nonstop in eighteen hours, across 2,400 miles of the Pacific ocean, from Hawaii to the United States. All American citizens, especially those on the Pacific coast, and elderly, out-of-date gentlemen who are supposed to provide for the defense of this country, should ask themselves:

If a young woman, entirely alone, without sleep, no assistant to help with navigation, can fly, unseen, across the Pacific ocean and land in California to receive a bunch of roses, eighteen hours from Hawaii, what do you think five or ten thousand powerful bombing and swift pursuit planes could do, coming from Asia or from Europe?

Pennsylvania is an important tobacco state. The government is paying farmers not to grow tobacco, just as it pays them elsewhere not to grow cotton or wheat and not to raise pigs.

After you have spent your whole life driven by necessity's lash to produce the utmost possible, this brings sweet peace to have the government pay you for not doing it, even if you can't quite understand it.

Nobody has yet arranged to pay newspaper publishers for not writing editorials, but that may come, in the glorious new era, and, here and there, it might be a great blessing.

Washington reports that President Roosevelt's message to congress about pensions for the old will suggest "only" $40 a month.

The Washington correspondent who says "only" does not know what $40 a month would mean to millions of old people whose lives are made bitter not by deprivation, not by poverty, hunger or cold, but by the fact that they depend upon the cold charity of others, particularly on the charity of relatives.

Give $40 a month to the old that are dependent and you will bring happiness into the last years of millions of lives, and that would be worthy of a great nation.

The honorable Japanese chief of information in the foreign office says the United States is planning an attack on Japan. Any Japanese who believes it lacks the usual intelligence for which you give all Japanese credit. Nations start wars because they want something. What does the United States want from Japan?

Uncle Sam, in a mild fit of idiocy, is now giving away the Philippines, Asiatic islands richer in resources than the Japanese islands.

We got those islands from the Spanish war. Should we start another war, spend billions, kill many of our Japanese friends and burn up their country by fire bombardment from airplanes merely to get more Asiatic islands, to be given away later?

The thirst of the people means profit to the government. Uncle Sam during 1934 collected an average of more than $1,000,000 a day in liquor taxes, a total amount of $374,506,232. Beer alone yielded $200,000,000; spirits distilled in America, $121,000,000; imported spirits, $15,000,000; imported wines. $6,000,000.

It is easy to understand why tens of millions follow the trial of Bruno Hauptmann for the kidnaping and killing of the Lindbergh baby with such intense interest. The trial is a mystery in itself. Gradually unwound in court like the chapters in a detective story, it holds public attention, the horrible nature of the crime increasing the interest tenfold.

Eighty-nine Russian fishermen, living on the edge of the Caspian sea, ought to be grateful to the American Wright brothers that invented the airplane. With their boats they had drifted ten days on an ice floe and were starving.

Along came a big Russian plane, flying low, to drop tiny parachutes that brought food, tobacco and alcohol. Then the fishermen, hopelessly lost, out of sight of land, got in their boats and the airplane guided them to the shortest route to shore.

This reporter sat next to Amelia Earhart at a dinner recently, did not recognize her, thought she looked, as the French say, "like somebody," asked "Do you write, fly, or what do you do?" She said "I fly a little, and I write a little."

Europe continues "edging along" toward war. The Associated Press reports Italian troops being concentrated along the Austrian border. Italy fears that Germany may start an attack on Austria, aiming at absorption, now the Saar voting is over.

Italy calls this movement of troops along the Austrian border "Winter maneuvers," but Europe knows what it really is.

France probably will not be surprised. Mussolini for Italy and Laval for France recently had a very affectionate conversation, of which the substance was "Keep Germany under control."

FOUR GIRL SPIES SHOT IN GERMANY; BETRAYED SECRETS

Sensational History Lies Behind Shooting of Fair Typists.

London.—A sensational secret history lies behind the grim announcement from Berlin that a number of alleged spies have been sentenced to death.

The death sentences mark the climax of a great espionage drama, which opened six months ago with a raid by the Nazi secret police on a gay Berlin party, at which a handsome Polish count and a beautiful Persian woman were entertaining prominent members of Berlin society.

The official statement on the sentences, issued by the press office of the German ministry of justice, is as follows:

"A number of persons charged with high treason on behalf of foreign powers have recently been tried before the third senate of the people's court.

Sentenced to Die.

"Several of the accused were sentenced to death, and in other cases to hard labor up to fifteen years. Only in two minor cases did the accused escape with ordinary prison sentences."

The statement points out that under a new law all cases of high treason are punished on principle with death.

A government official was questioned about the statement. "It is nothing," he said, "a mere recapitulation of a few recent cases. No names will be revealed."

Among private commentators, however, it was whispered that some of the people concerned in the famous Sosnowsky case six months ago were probably among those sentenced.

The opening act in that drama, to which the recent official announcement adds a grim epilogue, is recalled by D. Sefton Delmer in the graphic report which appears below.

That was six months ago. It was the opening scene of the greatest spy scare in the post-war history of Germany.

Spent Money Freely.

Count Sosnowsky, with his beautiful friend, Mme. Katja Berberian, had been seen, night after night, spending money in the Berlin night clubs, entertaining a host of distinguished friends.

An investigation of Count Sosnowsky's movements was begun, which for thoroughness and ruthlessness can only be paralleled by the Ogpu of Russia.

When, on that grim night in April, the Berberian party was arrested, more than fifty other persons, all of them friends of the count and the Persian girl, were arrested in other parts of Berlin.

Among those arrested were four girls, secretaries at the reichswehr ministry—the German war office.

One of them was a countess, two others were baronesses.

A few weeks later the girls' families were informed they had violated the oath of secrecy which they had sworn when they were appointed as secretaries in the ministry

They had been court-martialed and found guilty of high treason. Their bodies could be obtained on application at the Lichterfelde mortuary.

Suicide of Electrician Shuts Off City Lights

Valencia, Spain.—Like the tragic hero of Eugene O'Neill's "Dynamo," Domingo Valladolid, powerhouse worker, committed suicide by flinging himself upon the live contacts of a high-tension generator.

Valladolid shot and killed his wife, ran into the hydro-electric substation where he was employed and before fellow workers could stop him, threw himself upon the generator contacts.

Most of Valencia was plunged into darkness when the short circuit caused by Valladolid's body blew out the generator's kickback fuses. Neighbors and friends of the Valladolids could give no reason for the man's act.

Hunter Plays Opossum—Tricks Trio of Bears

Sitka, Alaska.—William Martilla, Alaskan hunter, owed his life today to his emulation of an opossum when a tree-climbing bear attacked him.

The bear, one of three which had treed him, clawed him off the limb and Martilla fell to the ground.

Like the opossum, he feigned death when the bears came over to him. The large male bear in the trio slapped Martilla with his paws and departed The hunter had a punctured lung, a crushed arm and scalp lacerations but he will recover.

Huge Eagles Battle to Death in California

Hanford, Calif.—Upholding the excellence of California climatic conditions for the production of practically anything, two eagles, each with a wing span of 10 feet, were reported found near here. The eagles, local residents said, had killed each other in what was probably a battle for the throne of western eagledom.

LUXURY BATHING HELD AS WISE BEAUTY COURSE

In the hope of acquiring or retaining beauty, the fair sex indulges in much that is mere speculation. A luxury bath, however, is a wise investment for any woman.

"There is a healing quality about water and an inspiriting effect from exquisite physical care," writes Jeanette Eaton in The Parents' Magazine. "Work these benefits into your feeling centers before going to sleep or plunging into the maelstrom of practical existence."

The health of the skin and refreshment for all nerves are so essential to good looks and contentment that whatever else she does without, it should never be the bath crystals, powders and oils, delicately perfumed, that induce the pleasurable sensations in the bath that re-create her. All of these may be obtained at reasonable prices, one at a time, possibly, if the purse is not too bulging. In the opinion of the writer the well-ordered bath equipment includes brushes with which every bit of dirt can be scrubbed from the pores, huge towels for the rub-down and a soft bath-mat on which to stand while "polishing off."

The writer reminds her readers that faces prefer patting to any other method of treatment, and suggests that it is well to apply cold cream to special areas, as ankles, elbows and knees before taking the tub or the "daily dozen" which may precede it.

Millions have found in Calotabs a most valuable aid in the treatment of colds. They take one or two tablets the first night and repeat the third or fifth night if needed.

How do Calotabs help Nature throw off a cold? First, Calotabs are one of the most thorough and dependable of all intestinal eliminants, thus cleansing the intestinal tract of the germ-laden mucus and toxines. Second, Calotabs are diuretic to the kidneys, promoting the elimination of cold poisons from the blood. Thus Calotabs serve the double purpose of a purgative and diuretic, both of which are needed in the treatment of colds.

Calotabs are quite economical; only twenty-five cents for the family package, ten cents for the trial package. (Adv.)

The Man from Yonder

A New Serial by

HAROLD TITUS

No one knew anything about Ben Elliott when he arrived in Tincup, but it wasn't long before his name was on every tongue, for hadn't he given "Bull" Duval, Nick Brandon's hired thug, a beating he would never forget: hadn't he taken over the impossible job of running the Hoot Owl outfit after many an older and more experienced man had failed; and hadn't he had the courage to defy Brandon himself, the man who held Tincup in the hollow of his hand?

The old-timers stood by and scratched their heads—here was a youngster doing things that couldn't be done and doing them well, in spite of fire and dynamite and many another hazard. And Ben carried on, unconscious of the magnitude of his job, carried on for the sake of a little girl whom he had never seen—until one day he discovered that she was a little girl no longer, but a lovely young woman—and the one person in all the world that Nick Brandon really cared for.

Here, indeed, were complications, but Ben Elliott thrived on complications though he had to admit that the winning of Dawn McManus was the toughest job he had ever tackled.

Harold Titus tells this thrilling tale of romance and adventure in his latest North Woods story, "The Man From Yonder." Readers of this paper who are familiar with the clean, vigorous stories that Titus writes will be glad to know that we have obtained the publication rights to "The Man From Yonder." All of our readers, we are sure, will enjoy reading it as it appears rially in these columns.

ADS. WILL TELL BANKERS' STORY

American Bankers Association President Announces Move to Stimulate Newspaper Advertising

NEW YORK.—Plans for stimulating wider use of informative newspaper advertising by banks in promoting public understanding and confidence in regard to existing banking conditions and methods have been announced by R. S. Hecht, President of the American Bankers Association, as a part of his organization's activities in aid of business recovery.

A general groundwork was prepared through a nationwide survey of advertising by banks relative to their willingness to extend justifiable loans to industry and trade. This, he said, revealed that a large number in all parts of the country are pursuing aggressive policies along this line and encouraging their customers to develop forward looking business plans. "It is our aim to aid in fostering this constructive attitude whenever possible," he said.

The Theme of New Advertising

The association's Advertising Department, under the direct supervision of the general executive officers, has prepared, at the headquarters in New York City, an informative advertising series for the use of member banks in the association to aid them in developing in their own communities better general public understanding regarding banking, Mr. Hecht said.

"The underlying theme of this advertising is that sound banking is based on helpful human relations and that it has a unity of interest with the people of its community which binds them together with a common purpose," he said.

"We are confident that if a clear understanding of this is brought home to the people in all our banking communities, it will go far in restoring the public confidence which good banking deserves. A bank in which people deservedly believe is doubly safe, it is to the public interest for the people to have confidence in their banks.

The Place of Advertising

"We feel that bank advertising has a special public duty to perform in this connection under existing conditions. The copy which will be supplied in the service we have developed will not only aid the individual bank in promoting the use of its own facilities but is also aimed to bring about with the aid of newspaper advertising a clearer public viewpoint regarding the essential part it occupies in the life of its community."

Mr. Hecht emphasized in regard to the new advertising facilities being offered to the members of the association that they are not a profit making venture and that there is no intention to disturb existing advertising arrangements, the idea being that these institutional services shall supplement rather than replace present plans, or that they will give assistance to member banks now lacking satisfactory arrangements.

Better Breakfasts

"BREAKFAST is the bulwark of the American nation," remarked the emissary of a foreign nation who was sent here to observe the customs of our country for the benefit of his own. It is true that we prefer to face the fortunes of the day better fortified than the average continental on his cup of coffee or chocolate and bit of bread.

We are right—for us, at least. Life dashes along briskly over here, and we need energy every moment. Then, too, once immersed in the big business of living, we are loath to stop at midday precisely at they do across the seas. A good breakfast goes a long way towards a good day, so if you would improve the family fortunes give them a "better breakfast" tomorrow — here's one—

ver Used as Postman During Siege of Paris

During the siege of Paris by the Germans in 1870 the post office administration hit upon the expedient in addition to the balloons, of enclosing letters in small zinc globes, water tight and hermetically sealed, and dropping them into the Seine. There they floated, if they were not captured by the Germans, down the river to the French lines, where a net stretched across the river gathered them in, and they were sent on their way.

Unfortunately, for the French, the Germans discovered the character of these zinc floats, and as they could not hope to see and fish out by ordinary means all the letters that went down thus, they stretched across the river, at Villeneuve Saint Georges, a net of their own and effectually stopped this system of postal communication.

The zinc balls and their use were pretty nearly forgotten, when about twenty years ago, a fisherman found in the Seine near Villeneuve a queer

The Thermos Bottle

Thermos bottle is a trade name for a practical device invented by Sir James Dewar about 1892 for the purpose of containing intensely cold liquefied gases. It is also called a vacuum bottle as it consists essentially of a double-walled bottle or flask in which there is high vacuum between the walls. Radiation is prevented by silvering the walls, and there is, of course, nothing to conduct heat across the vacuum. The small opening to the flask is usually stoppered with a thick cork, this material being a very poor conductor of heat.

THE TIRE SENSATION OF '35

Sells on Sight!

TO SEE it is to buy it! That's the way extra value stands out in the new Firestone Century Progress Tire. We found out what car owners wanted most in a tire—then we gave it to them. Out of more than ten million visitors to the Firestone Factory at the World's Fair last year, we obtained this opinion: "Give us Blowout Protection, Non-Skid Safety, and Long Wear, at a Moderate Price."

That was a large order, and the price part of it was our biggest problem. We said to ourselves: "Surely, if millions of people could get the tire they wanted, they would BUY!" We could see volume production . . . resulting in unbelievably low prices — and savings for millions of car owners who wanted the safety, long wear, and dependability of a first quality tire, at a price that would permit them to replace not only one tire but all four tires.

So we built the greatest tire ever made to sell at these low prices. Then the wave of buying started—car owners from Coast to Coast bought — not just one or two tires — but complete sets!

Go to the Firestone Service Dealer or Service Store in your community TODAY! See the new Firestone Century Progress Tire—just look at the broad, husky shoulders, massive flat tread, deep-cut non-skid and Gum-Dipped cords. Did you ever see so much tire for so little money? No wonder it's the Tire Sensation of '35 and Sells on Sight! Why not equip your car with a complete set—while prices are still at today's low level. And remember, you get the new Firestone Triple Guarantee

It's no wonder this young lady looks puzzled—she probably doesn't know whether to stand the way she is and let us see the front of her snug wool bloomer dress, with its unusual closing and its inset of pleats for spirited striding, or to turn around so that we may admire that important "back interest" produced by the long smartly stitched pleat. Clever mothers will make up a plentiful supply of those trim little white collars and cuffs, for they know that nothing looks prettier on bright wool dresses. The bloomers, and long sleeves for those who prefer them, come with the pattern.

Pattern 2065 is available in sizes 2, 4, 6 and 8. Size 6 takes 2½ yards 36-inch fabric and ⅜-yard contrasting. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

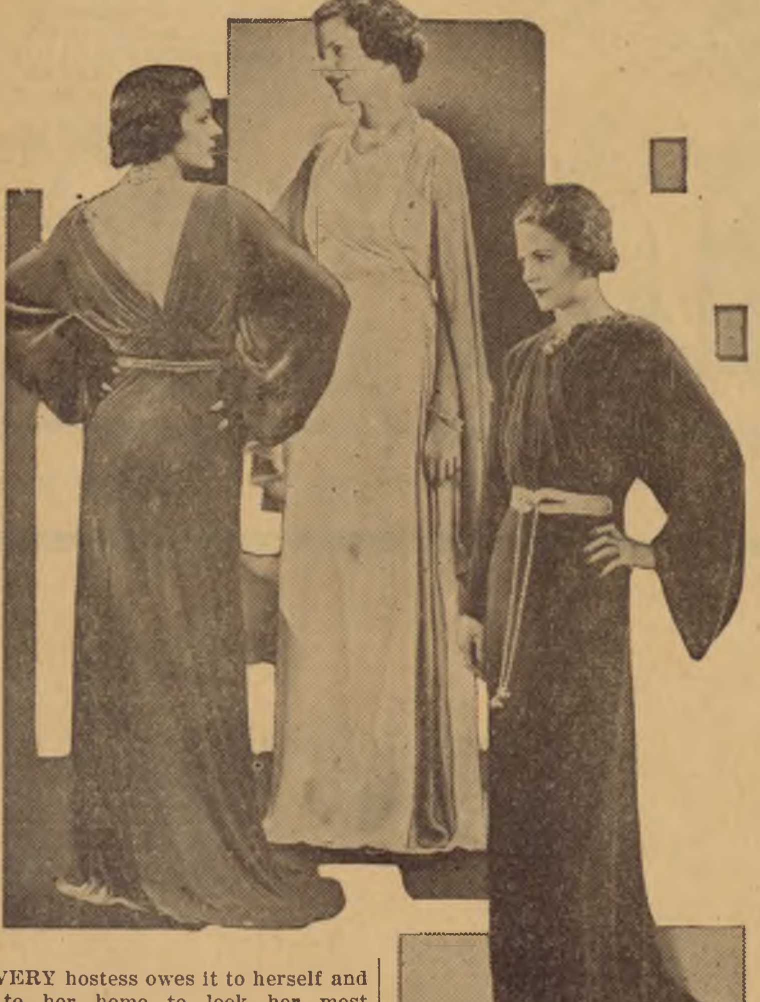
Velvet Hostess Gown Is Favorite

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



EVERY hostess owes it to herself and to her home to look her most charming when entertaining, and the way to do it is to wear velvet. This call for gowns not too formal and not too informal, which shall "add to the picture" of one's home environment, flings a challenge to designers to create dramatic effects which shall be in a class all their own. The result is that some very marvelous things are being accomplished in most picturesque fashion. For these lovely garments which gracious ladies wear in their homes, velvet has unmistakably proved a favorite medium.

Typical of the newest trends in hostess gowns are the three lovely fashions pictured. The center model, which is so sweetly simple yet so utterly sophisticated when it comes to meeting the demands of a fastidious mode, is fashioned of white transparent velvet with flowing sleeves of chiffon-lined red ombre velvet, the same dyed by hand. The godet in the side of the skirt is treated in the same way.

The cunning with which shirring is manipulated at the back of the bodice of the striking hostess gown, to the left in the group, is enough to cause one to order her dressmaker to go and do likewise when designing the next formal dress. If the lady in the picture would turn around a high cowl front would be seen, in contrast to the low-cut decoliette at the back. A double silver cord girdles the waistline with heavy silver tassels finishing at the front.

It is good style to use contrasting velvets for the hostess gown. We have in mind such fetching combinations as dark green velvet with a bright tangerine velvet girdle, also tangerine facings for the long winglike sleeves. Black with aquamarine blue, also black fuchsia with cerise, are likable color alliances.

One of fashion's latest whims is the tailored velvet hostess gown which has a shirtwaist top. A very effective model answering this description is made shirtwaist fashion of french blue velvet, the skirt, of course, being floor length with a tendency to trail slightly. There are touches of coral at throat and at waistline.

Then there is the hostess gown with the peasant-waist top. So called since its neckline gathers up on a drawstring. The full bishop sleeves are embroidered in brilliant peasant colors.

A new feature is the velvet gown with quilted cordings, or more ornate motifs which are fantastically quilted both on the sleeves and at the neckline, also here and there about the hemline. Speaking of hemlines the new slashed effects are as popular for hostess gowns as for evening dresses.

SILVER AND WHITE

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The hue and cry for white with silver is heard throughout all fashionland. This lovely evening dress is made of white and silver lame. A new way to wear orchids, as you plainly can see is to tuck them through your belt and wear them to the side.

Dress Accessories Follow Up Closely Ensemble Idea

The ensemble is now being followed more closely than ever in the line of dress accessories. Colpel, of Paris shows ensembles composed of a handbag and the little sports jacket to match in the same supple brown kid leather that are both fastened with heavy buttons in imitation tortoise shell. Many of these buttons are in square shapes.

At the same house is a handbag and gloves to match in supple leather in two shades of deep and lighter brown. Both the frame of the handbag and the glove cuffs were fastened by a clip in brown plastic material combined with dull gold metal. A model quite similar had the clips replaced by the wearer's initials.

DRESSMAKERS MAKE OUTFITS FOR BEACH

All the dressmakers are concentrating on beach outfits and ski ensembles. They have done about all they can in the regular town and country ensembles for morning, afternoon and evening. The smart set, incidentally, either is frolicking in the snow, or splashing in the Mediterranean, or getting ready to do so.

Madame Georgette Renal has made a popular beach ensemble of white linen, printed all over with sailor caps in blue and red. The red caps have blue pompons and the blue ones red ones. The blouse buttons in front in the form of a wide panel with two large pearl buttons on each side. The shorts are plain white linen and there is a jaunty looking jacket to keep the sunburn off the back and arms. Bright red wooden sandals with wide bands of blue canvas complete the outfit.

Shoe Fashion World Comes Out With Some New Ideas

New shoes take us in pleasant paths. Extreme, toeless slippers are out of favor for the nonce, and the pump returns, more high cut than of yore. A new shoe is in navy blue suede with a very high throat. It is trimmed with navy blue kid draped up the sides of the midfront. The heels are of blue kid. The same shoe is made in deep wine red and dark green. Colored shoes for town in the winter is a new and nice departure. For southern wear there is a beige antelope slipper, high and smooth in front, with a button fastening over the big cut-out at the side. It is piped in black patent leather, which, in turn, is piped with narrow silver.

For Evening

Some of the very newest evening gowns are to be seen in those well-known neutral shades of beige and gray. Both are observed in their most delicate tone and in such materials as satin, chiffon and moire.

Veiled Sequins

If sequins annoy with too much luster their glory can be dimmed with a chiffon veiling. Lelong applies this trick to an afternoon dress of dark blue crepe.

Church Debt Financed Along Business Lines

Ten days after a plan for paying off its indebtedness was adopted by St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church at Northport, Long Island, half of the goal of $20,000 had been obtained in pledges. It is expected that the plan will enable the church to pay the entire debt in thirty-six months without asking for any contributions.

The plan was devised by the Church Financing Bureau of New York, which is conducting the campaign. Friends and members of the church are asked to lend small sums which are to be repaid twenty years hence to the lenders or their heirs. To guarantee payment, the church will take out a policy, on the twenty-year endowment plan, on the life of the lender, and the church will pay the premiums.

The loans thus obtained are used to pay off the church's interest-bearing debt. The life insurance premiums the church pays are said to amount to less each year than the former interest rate alone. The principal indebtedness is being wiped out at the same time.—Literary Digest.

REPORT GIVEN ON FISH PLANTING

Montgomery, Ala. — The state department of game and fisheries reports that a total of 3,113,494 bass and bream were planted in Alabama streams during the quadrennium beginning Oct. 1, 1930 and ending Sept. 30, 1934.

This total represents 856,554 bass and 2,256,940 bream taken from state hatcheries at Eastaboga and Aliceville. The plantings were divided as follows:

The figures for 1933-34 are not quite complete as a few fish remained to be shipped at the time the repotr was submitted by the hatcheyr officials. Neither do these figures include millions of fish reclaimed from drained areas and overflow waters and transplanted by the field staff of the department.

Five or six hatcheries, each larger in area than those now devoted to fish culture by the state, are considered essential by the state game and fish authorities to produce to the number of fish Alabama should plant annually in its public waters.

No report is yet available on the number of fish planted in the state during the past four years by the federal hatcheries.

U. S. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION GIVES PUBLIC WARNING

Washington, D. C.—The United States Civil Service Commission says that numerous letters received at its office from different parts of the country indicate that misleading inormation is being given to the public by agents of some of the correspondence schools which give instruction in preparation for civil-service examinations.

To guard agains tthe loss of money paid for tuition of this kind the Civil Service Commission informs the public as follows:

No one can promise appointments to positions for which the United States Civil Service Commission holds examinations.. The claim that such assurance can be given brands the person making it as a fraud.

Information regarding examinations for the United States Civil Service may be obtained from the boards of the United States Civil Service Examiners. Such board is in each community which has a post office of the first or the second class. In nearly all cities the civil service board is located at the post office.

Before paying money for tuition, or signing a contract, it is advisable to make inquiry concerning the prospect of examinations. There is a reason to believe that agents of some schools deceive the public as to the probability of early examinations.

No schools has advance information regarding the need for employees or the probability of examinations.

President's Four Billion Dollar Relief Program Jammed Through House After Bitter Fight—Hauptmann Takes Stand in Own Defense.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

President Roosevelt

ADMINISTRATION forces using steam roller tactics crushed all opposition to jam the President's $4,800,000,000 relief program through the house. Efforts to fight the grant of such unprecedented authority to the President were unavailing as the White House cracked the whip over revolting representatives. Final vote on the measure was 328 to 78.

The vote climaxed a furious eight-hour debate on the measure. Members attempted to attach amendments which would protect private industry from government projects which might be launched under the relief plan. When this failed they endeavored to allocate the money for specific purposes.

When the debate had reached its height, the President sent a message to the house declaring it would be impossible to segregate items for which the money would be expended, but that the huge outlay of sums would be devoted to public projects and that after the immediate crisis of unemployment had passed it was his hope that the country could set aside $500,000,000 a year for the "national plan."

The White House message was the signal for the Democratic majority to push the message across with little change from its original form. On the final vote 26 Republicans voted for the bill. Seven Progressives and three Farmer-Laborites also registered affirmative votes. Ten Democrats, five from Georgia, three from Virginia, and two from Indiana, voted with the opposition.

Because of the gag rule adopted by the house, only amendments offered by the appropriations committee could be considered in vital sections of the measure. Such minor amendments as were decided upon went through without serious opposition.

One of the amendments striking out a list of projects that might be included in spending the $4,000,000,000 and left the vast sum to be used for "federal or nonfederal projects" actually broadened the powers of the President. The $800,000,000 will be used at the President's discretion for relief purposes while the program is being put into effect.

Another amendment struck out a subsection which gave the President authority to postpone the end of any existing government agency. This was a move to satisfy certain Democrats who were opposed to Secretary Ickes, and his PWA program which expires in June. Another clause granting authority to the President to acquire personal property by the power of eminent domain was also removed, as was the section granting the Chief Executive the power to impose two years' imprisonment on any violator. The only other amendment which succeeded in passage was one which provided that an accounting be made for all moneys spent.

Minority Leader Snell attacked the bill declaring that the money involved amounted to one-eighth of the national income, and that the house was entitled to know what the money was for. Later in conceding the minority's defeat he said that if the opposition was free to speak its mind, the bill would be defeated two to one, but that under the executive lash, there was no chance of defeating it.

NEW DEALERS sighed with relief as the Supreme court recessed until February 4 without handing down its decision in the gold cases, thus giving the administration more time in which to prepare legislation designed to handle the situation in the event the court renders an adverse decision.

At the same time the court promised to decide a case presenting a clear-cut test of the constitutionality of the national recovery act, and which will probably have considerable effect upon the ultimate fate of the already bedraggled Blue Eagle.

LEGISLATION which would permit the small investor to buy government securities and which provides for radical changes in government financing has been introduced in the house by Chairman Doughton of the house ways and means committee.

The bill, prepared by the Treasury department, places the administration squarely against inflation. It provides authority to raise money necessary for the public works, social security and similar measures, meet federal deficits, and might even be used to provide funds for payment of the soldiers' bonus.

Under provisions of the measure there would be ten-year bonds in amounts as small as $25, and as explained by the Treasury department, would be sold below par. There would be no interest, but each six months the bonds would appreciate in value at the rate of 2½ per cent, plus compounded earnings.

Huge sums are involved: first, the creation of a revolving bond authorization fund of $2,500,000,000; and second, the consolidation of the two present revolving funds of $10,000,000,000 each into a joint $20,000,000,000 fund for bills, certificates and notes.

A NEW lease of life for the Reconstruction Finance corporation was seen as a result of a favorable vote by the senate banking committee, after hearing Jesse Jones RFC chairman, and Commissioner Charles D. Mahaffie of the interstate commerce commission.

The proposed bill permits the RFC to buy railroad obligations in reorganization proceedings with the approval of the ICC; to buy stock in mortgage loan companies and similar financial institutions; to purchase the assets of closed banks under certain conditions; to increase authorized investments in preferred stock and capital notes of insurance companies, and to continue the Commodity Credit corporation and the Export-Import bank.

Bruno Hauptmann

WHITE-FACED, under the glare of the courtroom lights, but apparently cool, Bruno Richard Hauptmann took the stand to begin his fight for life. The little Flemington (N. J.) courthouse was packed as the man accused of the murder of the first-born son of Charles A. Lindbergh began his testimony which he appears confident will save him from the electric chair.

Calmly, he told of his early life, of his war service, and admitted that he had once been convicted in Germany. His thick, guttural voice resounded through the room as he recounted how he had made three attempts to enter this country before he was successful.

Under the smooth questioning of Chief Defense Counsel Reilly he related the details of his life up until the time of the Lindbergh baby kidnaping, and then proposed the alibi upon which he is apparently relying for acquittal.

Hauptmann declared that on the night of April 2, 1932, when $50,000 was paid to a man in St. Raymond's cemetery, New York, he, his wife and a man named Kloppenberg had been at home until about eleven o'clock and that he did not leave his home at all that evening. He also denied that he had been absent from work on the day the kidnaping took place.

Two witnesses introduced by the defense to establish Hauptmann's alibi were not entirely satisfactory. Christian Frederickson, Bronx baker, said Hauptmann's wife had been employed in his store as a waitress and counter girl and that the accused had called for her on the night of March 1. Upon cross-examination, however, he stated that he was not sure, but that it must have been so because it was Hauptmann's custom to call for his wife whenever she worked late.

Mrs. Frederickson also stated that Mrs. Hauptmann worked late on the night of March 1, but was unable to say whether Hauptmann had been at the bakery. She stated, however, that she had seen Isador Fisch, furrier friend of Hauptmann who died in Germany, on the eve of his sailing for Germany in November, 1932. She said Fisch displayed a large sum of money, but she was unable to say whether it was in greenbacks or gold certificates.

Throughout Hauptmann's testimony Colonel Lindbergh continued to stare at him. During the court session, Lindbergh reiterated his belief that Hauptmann's voice was the same as that of the mysterious "John" who had hoaxed him out of the ransom money nearly three years ago.

WAR flamed again in Manchukuo as Japanese troops struck suddenly at three points in Chahar province in northern China. Three fortified cities were shelled, and there were indications that the drive had only begun.

The Japanese attack came as a surprise since it was reported that negotiations for a peaceful settlement of the dispute over Chahar province had been nearing a successful conclusion. Japan had asserted that Chinese troops in Chahar had invaded Jehol.

Military authorities declined to announce the real objective of the drive. The district which the Japanese troops occupied is about 150 miles long by 50 miles wide, and is said to contain valuable gold mines.

Japan's action is seen by Chinese leaders as a determined gesture to intimidate Mongolian princes of Inner Mongolia and to cut the overland route connecting Peiping with Urga, capital of Soviet controlled Outer Mongolia.

The situation is viewed with considerable apprehension by Soviet Russia. The drive will bring Japanese military operations into direct contact with the borders of Outer Mongolia, and practically all high officials of the territory who have been attending the Soviet anniversary celebrations in Moscow have hurried back to their provinces.

JAPAN'S foreign minister, Koki Hirota, warned Soviet Russia that she should stop fortifying the Siberian frontier north of Manchukuo if friendly relations are to be continued between the two countries. His remarks, made in an address before the imperial diet, had special significance in view of reports that Japanese troops are invading Chahar province to prevent Sovietization of that region.

Russian fortifications in the Far East, particularly of the strategic crossings of the Amur river, are becoming increasingly irksome to the Japanese army in Manchukuo. Other projects to which Japan is objecting are double-tracking of the Trans-Siberian railway to Vladivostock and remodeling of the strong fortifications of that Pacific port.

Government officials in Washington were said to be favorably impressed with part of Hirota's address which referred to Japan's desire to avoid further expansion of armament. It is hoped that negotiations will be resumed soon for another agreement to replace the renounced Washington treaty which established the 5-5-3 ratio for the United States, Great Britain and Japan.

RECOMMENDATIONS that America's air defense facilities be greatly increased will be made by President Roosevelt in a special message soon to be sent to congress, it has been indicated by those close to the administration. Construction of a series of air bases for the United States, the addition of 4,000 planes to the service, and building a huge dirigible will be among the projects which the President approves.

The proposed construction is in accord with a report just made by the special aviation commission. It is the purpose of the commission to lease the dirigible to a commercial firm as a sister ship to the Graf Zeppelin which will start regular transatlantic service within a few weeks.

The series of bases along the Pacific and Atlantic coasts will make America impregnable to air attack, the commission believes, while the addition of 4,000 planes to the army and navy service will bring it up to far more than the existing fighting strength.

The commission has also recommended creation of a special five-man aviation commission to regulate civil aeronautics.

THE death toll continued to mount as reports seeped in from northwest Mississippi and southwest Tennessee where the turbulent Coldwater river was a raging torrent, threatening the lives and property of thousands in its march to the Tallahatchie basin.

Freezing weather added to the suffering of thousands driven from their homes. Workers toiled to rescue as many as possible of those who had been marooned on roof tops and in trees. A number of communities have been evacuated because it is feared the waters will continue to spread. Appeals for additional help in caring for the homeless have been made by public officials, and Red Cross aid has been rushed to the stricken areas.

Premier Mussolini

POSSIBILITY of a move by the Italian government to make a protectorate out of Ethiopia was seen by European statesmen. Exploitation of the announcement of the slaying of a French Somaliland administrator and 96 French Somaliland adployees and Somalis was said to indicate that a movement was on for Italy to take over the mountainous African kingdom to restore order. The consent of France and Great Britain to the plan has been obtained, it was reported.

A number of recent developments point toward some action by the Italian government. Premier Mussolini recently took over the office of minister of colonies; Gen. Emilio de Bono, former minister of colonies, was named high commissioner of Italian East Africa; military roads have been constructed through Italian Somaliland to the Ethiopian frontier; and the Italians have recently taken over a bigger share in the operation of the Djibouti and Addis Abbaba railway.

Recent history affords a number of precedents for the Italian government to follow. Japanese intervention in Manchuria was "to restore order and reduce Chinese banditry," and Italy might use the excuse of reducing Ethiopian banditry as a reason for invasion. The British action in Egypt and the Sudan, and the French subjugation of Tunis also offer parallel cases.

EUROPEAN statesmen anxiously watched developments in the cantons of Eupen and Malmedy on the Belgian frontier as gendarmerie re-enforcements were rushed to arrest Nazi agitators who have been advocating annexation of that territory with the German reich. Loyalists report a campaign of terrorism has been carried on against those who have refused to join an organization directed by the Brown Shirts. The Belgian government is expected to lodge a complaint with the League of Nations.

The cantons which were taken from Germany under the Versailles treaty have considerable commercial importance. Formerly a part of Rhenish Prussia, they have an area of about 400 square miles and a population in excess of 60,000 people. Eupen boasts spinning mills and other establishments connected with the textile industry, iron foundries, machine shops and tanneries.

Supreme Court Has Last Word

Washington.—It is seldom that any genuine widespread interest is evidenced in decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States. Although that distinguished body of nine men holds in its hands power coequal to that of the President and of congress, some way it has never been a part of the government to which attention has been directed nationally. Of course, there are more people who are not lawyers than who are familiar with laws and that may be the answer to the fact that the Supreme court can be said to be little known.

But it seems now that the court is to be a center of attraction just as interesting as either the executive or legislative branches. The reason is that the highest legal tribunal in the land has before it for decision some of the most momentous legal controversies to engage the country since the days of the Civil war. Through many months, questions concerning the New Deal, their legality and constitutionality, have been wending their slow, tortuous way through the lower courts, through the courts of appeals to the court of last resort under the structure which we know as our government.

One of these, as I reported to you previously, has already been decided. In that instance, the Supreme court by a vote of eight of the nine judges determined that President Roosevelt had gone beyond the powers accorded him under the Constitution in prohibiting export of oil from the state where it was recovered.

Within a very short time now the most important case of all affecting the New Deal will be decided. I refer to the so-called gold cases. Five questions are before the court and if it decides adversely to the government's claim on any of them, the monetary policy upon which the New Deal has beeen operating becomes virtually null and void. The court heard lengthy arguments by high powered lawyers on the part of the government and on the part of private citizens who claim that their rights have been abridged by the Roosevelt money policies and they naturally are seeking redress.

No one dares to make a prediction concerning pending action by the Supreme court. It can be only a guess at any time in advance of a rule by that group of men because with one or two exceptions since the nation was founded, its decisions have never leaked out ahead of the time they are formally handed down from the bench.

Lawyers throughout the land are watching and waiting for the court's findings. But the most fidgety of all lawyers are those in the government who recognize that an adverse decision by the court will flatten out the New Deal and force a wholesale revision of policies. I am told that this group of lawyers is none too certain of its ground. True, they made what is recognized as a strong argument in support of the government's position but the difficulty seems to be from their standpoint that the Constitution was written before the brain trust came into action and the Constitution itself provides the only ways by which it may be changed. Brain trust ideas, however good they may be, necessarily are worthless and useless if they contravene the basic provisions of the Constitution to which the nation adheres.

Important Question

Among the questions before the Supreme court in the gold cases, that one brought forward by a suit to compel the government to pay gold in redeeming one of its own bonds is by far the most important. Indeed, that case can be said to have an overwhelming importance. If the court rules that the government cannot void its contract—for a bond is generally recognized as a contract—to pay back the borrowed money under the term named in that bond, then the seizure of gold by the government in 1933 likewise is voided. In other words, every person holding a government bond containing a promise to pay in gold is entitled to have that gold from the treasury. It takes no stretch of the imagination to see what effect that will have on the whole money program.

Likewise, if the court determines that an individual who has promised to pay in gold must observe the terms of that agreement, the administration is again in a hole. Since contracts, agreements or bonds containing the promise to pay in gold are in general use and have been written since time immemorial the amount of such payments is virtually incalculable. I have heard many estimates of the total amount of money involved by the so-called gold clause but I hesitate to use any of them because it is patent on the face of things that an accurate figure is impossible.

One can get down to brass tacks on the effect of affirmation of the gold clause, however, by the simple application of the ratio of gold to the present dollar. When those gold contracts were written a dollar in currency was redeemable for a dollar in gold. At that time gold was valued at around $21 an ounce. The Roosevelt administration arbitrarily increased that value to a few cents over $35 an ounce. Without going into all of the details it means that to gain the same amount of gold now which a dollar would have brought prior to the Roosevelt administration action one will have to pay $1.69. To state it another way, if the gold contracts involve $1,000,000,000, those who are obligated to pay in gold will have to pay $1,690,000,000 at the present rate. Obviously, debtors under that circumstance will find themselves between the upper and nether millstones, well squashed, if the court rules adversely to the government's policy.

Attorney General Cummings in his plea to the Supreme court made the argument that an adverse decision would mean chaos to the country. I believe there can be no doubt about that. But the point is deeper. Roosevelt administration policies were hammered through congress and received the legislative body's rubber stamp by direction of the President.

* * *

What's to Be Done?

What is going to be done about it? I don't know. Further I don't believe the administration knows what it is going to do in event the court rules against the government in these cases. There have been numerous conferences, frequent speculations by subordinate officials and many guesses by individuals. The President himself said in a press conference the other day that he would not discuss the gold question while the matter was pending before the Supreme court. It was a simple way to avoid expressing his hopes or his fears.

It is to be noted, however, that during the ten days in which the court heard arguments in the gold cases, a considerable number of senators and representatives sat glued in their seats in the gloomy old Supreme court chamber under the dome of the Capitol. They were obviously wondering. None of them thus far has offered publicly a suggestion as to what he will do in event the monetary policies are overturned. After all, if the Roosevelt program is upset, congress simply will have to enact some new laws and that was the chief reason why so many of the congressional leaders were seen in attendance at court.

The court will rush its decision. Of that there can be no doubt. Always, it has put cases of paramount importance to the nation ahead of those that affect only a small number of private litigants. Everyone believes, therefore, that in this instance the Supreme court has laid aside most of its other work in order to devote its attention to a thorough-going examination of the present problems.

Lawyers tell me that if the court rejects the Roosevelt policies as untenable under the Constitution, congress will have to put through some new laws on the subject at break-neck speed in order to avoid a hiatus that would flood the courts with an unprecedented number of suits.

To Restrict Cotton Output

The agricultural adjustment administration has fixed the cotton crop for the coming season at 10,500,000 bales — the same as last year. At the same time, we have begun to hear talk in Washington of a plan to seek a world agreement restricting the output of cotton after the manner of the attempt to restrict the world production of wheat, a move that went exactly nowhere.

Determination of the same production for cotton in 1935 that was used as the base in 1934 is accepted as in line with the administration's plans for raising prices artificially through curtailment of production. It had been expected that the 1935 crop might be as high as 12,000,000 bales. But since the administration has decided to carry on further its experiment into artificial price raising fields by production limitation, some of the background of that policy and the American relationship to world conditions warrant examination.

The American production until a few years ago was about 60 per cent of the world's cotton output. Now it is down to about 43 per cent of the total. Last year, the world consumption of cotton, according to the Department of Commerce figures, declined by about 700,000 bales whereas the world consumption, excluding that used in the United States, increased by something over 1,300,000 bales. It is to be noted further that although American exports in general increased last year, the quantity of cotton shipped last year fell off by approximately 28 per cent.

For several years now, we have been hearing more and more of efforts by foreign nations to increase thier cotton production. Brazil has been making a determined drive to develop cotton as a major product. Mexican cotton production has increased in a substantial way. Egyptian cotton production is on the increase. The British guidance has served to spur production of cotton in India and at the moment there is no sign of any slacking of the increase there. All of this is happening while our own southern cotton fields are being limited in their capacity to produce that staple commodity.

When Molding Salads

Many salads such as chicken, crab, or tuna, look more appetizing if molded and placed on lettuce. You may use a custard cup to take the place of a regular mold. Wet the cup first, then press the salad into it. Hold the cup over the lettuce on the plate. The salad will come out easily and well molded.

CHAPTER I

It was Armistice day in Tincup.

The time was so far removed from that delirious date in 1918 that in many parts of the country the eleventh of November had come to be regarded as simply another day, but Tincup was a mill town and the surrounding country was timber land and in such a community almost any anniversary from the Fourth of July on down to the millwright's birthday is seized upon as an excuse to lay off and play.

So the camps which turned Nicholas Brandon's standing hardwood and hemlock into saw logs, and the mills which chewed them into dimension stuff and flooring and shingles were deserted, and the entire population of a big territory which had commenced pouring into town the evening before was joined for the day with the residents of Tincup in competing or watching or cheering or listening.

In consequence a mere event such as the arrival of the eastbound passenger train drew no attention whatever and so none but the station agent was there to greet the stranger as he dropped down from the rickety red smoking car between his pack-sack, slung from one shoulder, and old Don Stuart, literally dangling from his other arm. The agent, trundling his express truck and in a hurry to be done with duty and get back to the more exciting affairs which occupied the rest of the town, spoke:

"Hul-lo, Don! Back home, eh? Well . . . Glad t' see you!

"Better git up to the big doin's." Log rollin's just goin' on. Big time!"

As if to vindicate this prideful boast of one of its own, all Tincup and its company at the moment opened lips and compressed chests to send up a mighty, roaring shout of acclaim.

"Come on, Dad," the younger man said, looking toward the crowd. "He says it's a big time. Big noise, anyhow. Let's investigate."

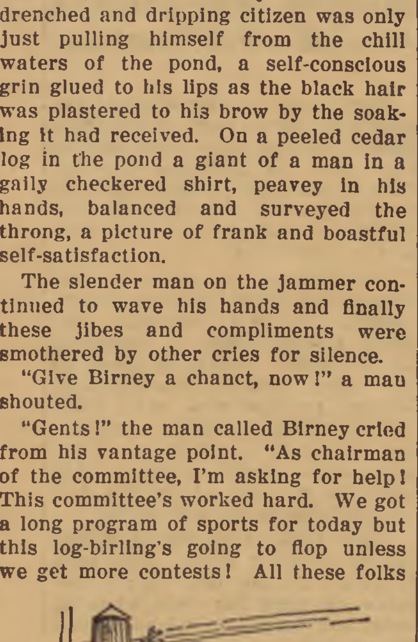
Slowly, then, the sharply contrasting pair moved off, the younger still half supporting the elder and moderating his gait to a stroll so Stuart's quick and audible breathing should grow no more pronounced.

A slender young man was climbing a jammer in the mill yard. He lifted himself above the heads of the crowd and held up a hand for silence. This, however, was not readily obtained. A drenched and dripping citizen was only just pulling himself from the chill waters of the pond, a self-conscious grin glued to his lips as the black hair was plastered to his brow by the soaking it had received. On a peeled cedar log in the pond a giant of a man in a gaily checkered shirt, peavey in his hands, balanced and surveyed the throng, a picture of frank and boastful self-satisfaction.

The slender man on the jammer continued to wave his hands and finally these jibes and compliments were smothered by other cries for silence.

"Give Birney a chanct, now!" a man shouted.

"Gents!" the man called Birney cried from his vantage point. "As chairman of the committee, I'm asking for help! This committee's worked hard. We got a long program of sports for today but this log-birling's going to flop unless we get more contests! All these folks 've come to town more to see this match than anything else on the card and what 've we showed 'em?



He Had Watched the Bull's Every Move.

"Why, nothin'!" he answered his own question. "We had two preliminaries and a semi-final between the winners of them matches. Then this final which was a joke. There stands Bull Duval, whose partner in the preliminaries defaulted and who dumped the winner of the semi-final without half trying. I ask you, has he earned twenty-five dollars?"

"Here we raised a twenty-five dollar prize and half you river hogs got cold feet just because Duval said he was goin' to roll!" Birney was truly annoyed and took no pains to conceal it. "Ain't any of you lads got the sand to hand in your names and tackle the Bull. Where's your guts?" he pleaded. "Ain't there anybody here that needs twenty-five dollars?"

Another laugh went up and when it had subsided a voice said:

"Here's one. What'll I do to get it?"

This was a full, even, good-natured voice, and a quick silence fell upon the crowd, followed by an expectant buzz as the stranger moved forward, his bronzed face uplifted to the man on the jammer.

"Atta boy!" Birney cried. "All you got to do, friend, is to put Mr. Bull Duval off that log and stick by rules!"

The stranger slipped the pack strap from his shoulder, seated himself on a log, unlaced his shoes and unstrapped the bag. While he drew from its depths a pair of calked river boots and the cluster about him grew thicker a half dozen old men crowded around Don Stuart, shaking his hand and saying the usual things that men say to an old friend they have not seen for long.

One of these was a short, wiry little man with upturned nose and blue eyes and long lip.

"'Nd who's th' b'y, Donny?" he asked. "Who's th' b'y thut's goin' to try Misther Brandon's pet bull?"

Stuart shook his head.

"He's a fine young gentleman, Bird-Eye, and that's all I know. Found me at th' Junction . . . broke and wantin' to . . . get back home to Tincup. Paid my fare . . . and helped me. Fine gentleman!"

"He'd better be all o' that!" the other commented with an emphatic nod. "'Nd here's hopin' he's a log rollin' rascal 'nd that he dumps Misther Brandon's bull 'nd thin drowns him, so I do!"

Others came up, greeted Stuart and eyed him with true concern. Any could see that heavy sickness was on him.

Birney was bending over the stranger as he drew taut the laces of his river boots.

"Well, gents, we got one more to try for this prize money. Mister Bull Duval, king of the Mad Woman, will now take on Mister Ben Elliott . . . Mr. Ben Elliott of— Where'd you say you come from, Elliott?"

The stranger, so addressed, was hefting a peavey judiciously. He turned that good-natured smile on the spokesman and waved one hand in an indefinite but inclusive gesture.

"Yonder," he said and grinned.

"Mr. Ben Elliott of Yonder will now roll against Mr. Bull Duval for the grand prize of twenty-five bucks! That rope around the log marks the middle, Elliott. Stay on your own end, don't touch the other man and anything else goes!"

As a helper used a pike pole to drag the cedar with Duval upon it close, Elliott stood still and surveyed his adversary. His glance held that light of good nature and did not linger long on the Bull's glowering countenance. Rather, it dwelt on his pants and the river boots, shedding water in oily beads. After this, he looked Duval in the eye and grinned broadly.

A sound like a breath which is almost a laugh ran through the crowd. A likeable grin, that was, good-natured, frank, fearless; men take to a grin of its kidney and on the instant, Ben Elliott, the stranger, had the crowd with him as against Bull Duval, said to be king of the river.

The cedar came against the boom stick and Elliott took his place on it with a light leap. It was a good log, nearly two feet through at the small end, twenty feet long, with a small taper, dry and peeled; a sprightly log, indeed, for such a contest, a log to try the mettle of any man matched with any sort of contestant. Add to this, Bull Duval, the best river hog in Tincup, who hefted his peavey and glowered at the stranger.

"I give y' two minutes," he growled.

"Thanks, buddy!" Elliott retorted. "I'd say that's sweet of you!"

"Are you two ready?" Birney cried from shore.

Both nodded.

"Then let her go!"

A hush. Balanced on the log, faced in the same direction, double an arm's length from one another, they poised. And then Duval's right toe lifted, the heel pressing downward; the buoyant log moved quickly. His left foot raised free, sharp calks in its sole clawed savagely and with a mighty drive of the leg he had the cedar spinning beneath them.

Ben Elliott did not offer resistance. He followed the moving footing, walking for the first three or four turns and then, adding his impetus to the birling stick, commenced to trot, with each stride forcing the tempo of the turning.

Faster and faster, now. The trotting became a run; the run waxed to a nimble dance.

They watched one another. Ben Elliott still grinned. The Bull glared. His black brows were drawn together and he ground down on his chew savagely, almost hatefully. . . .

Up and down, up and down; a mad gallop of supple limbs, now, and then—

Duval leaped. He leaped high and without warning and, feet spread, drove his calks deep into the log again, hunching his shoulders, thrusting his peavey before him for balance, bending forward. The spin of the stick was checked sharply and had his opponent been caught unprepared, he certainly would have pitched face foremost into the pond.

But Elliott was not unprepared. He had watched the Bull's every move. He did not jump when Duval jumped; he waited a split instant, eyes on Duval's feet, and when he saw the toes pointed stiffly downward he rose nimbly into the air, a galloping break in his swift run, and came down, poised, spread-legged himself, crying out in an ejaculation of mock distress as he balanced on the cedar which swayed and heaved beneath them.

A great roar went up, cries of encouragement for the stranger, some shouts of admonition for their townsman. The Bull would have no cinch in this contest!

Now it was Elliott who started the log, cautiously and slowly, watching Duval.

On the shore Bird-Eye pranced up and down, swinging his arms.

"Duck him, Elliott!" he yelled. "Duck th' big chunk! Sure 'nd he needs him a bath!"

The smooth bole gathered momentum swiftly and Elliott began to skip and dance, breaking the steady measure of his run. As his weight came and went irregularly upon the cedar it commenced to teeter, causing Duval's feet to splash in ankle-deep water. Again without warning, the Bull leaped. He went higher, this time, but instead of driving his spikes into the far side of the log and stopping its spin as he had done before, he drove them into the near side, increasing rather than checking the momentum.

"Got you, big boy!" Elliott cried as he, too, came down running . . . and grinning.

That was quick thinking, instantaneous action. To leap was simple; but to determine the opponent's move and meet it with complacence and poise was another matter. To have come down to a stance, then, would have flung the challenger to wet defeat.

"Ah, th' big chunk av a Bull's goin' to get thut bath he needs!" Bird-Eye shrilled into the roar.

But this was only one man's enthusiasm, his animosity for Duval finding voice. The outcome was far from a certainty. Tincup knew that; and Ben Elliott knew it as well. He—like the town—was waiting for the king of the Mad Woman to draw more items from his bag of tricks before he should assume the offensive.

Without a flicker of warning Duval dropped the pick of his peavey, twisting the shaft in his hands, flipping the hook open. The point plunked into the water, the hook bit into the log simultaneously and as the handle swung upward in a swift arc the man drove his weight on it. His body twisted, he grunted and his face wrenched into a lightning expression of great strain as the cedar, in a quarter turn, stopped dead. . . . And Ben Elliott, back bowed acutely, peavey high above his head, teetering back to balance on one foot, laughed aloud!

"Quick work, big boy!" he cried. "Almost got me!"

But Duval had nowhere near gotten him; he knew it, and Elliott's manner was infuriating to him. He cursed sharply and spat and jerked at the brim of his slouch hat as he shook loose the peavey and commenced again to birl.

They ran a moment easily, each waiting for the other to try some fresh trick. The Bull leaped and came down running; he leaped four times in the space of as many quick breaths. And then, as though ready to leap again, dropped the hook of his peavey into the cedar. He wavered when the handle, swept upward by the rush and weight of the spinning log, bore against his great palm. His body swung sharply to the left. He cursed as the smooth handle slipped from his clutch and Bird-Eye Blaine danced in a frenzy of delight as the peavey, handle smacking the water, disappeared in the pond and the Bull, waving his arms for balance, ran the log desperately to hold his place. A great shout went up from the crowd.

The odds, then, were no longer equal. Like a fencer with a broken foil, like a boxer with one eye closed, like a runner with a strained tendon, so Duval was now.

"Polish him off, now!" Bird-Eye screamed, like an audacious, saucy boy. "Polish him good, Misther Elliott! He's yawpin' for help 'nd the' ain't none fer him!"

That was what Tincup believed. A quick finish seemed certain, with the Bull so handicapped, without his peavey for offensive moves or to hold for balance.

But what happened stilled the clamor quickly, as though sound were a tangible mass and a great blade had sheared it quickly and cleanly.

Ben Elliott shifted his peavey. He had held it across his body, arms wide spread. Now he swung the point upward and outward and as he ran the spinning log drew it back and tossed it toward shore. Tossed it high and far, sending with it his chance for a quick and certain victory.

The silence was that of amazement. This was like letting a man you had knocked down get to his feet and have another chance; this was opportunity handed to truculent Bull Duval on a silver platter. This was the sportsmanship one read about . . . And then came an excited clatter of tongues, rising to an even greater roar. The outsider was through fooling, through with trickery and through with strategy. He was going to run the Bull off his feet!

Fast and faster spun the log. Spray from it drenched the men to their knees, rained behind them into the pond. Elliott still kept his face turned toward his opponent but the Bull, fists clenched, arms widely extended, only watched Elliott from the tail of his eye.

The log was hissing in the water. Rigidity ran from the Bull's shoulders down his back. He was upright, now, where Elliott was poised forward. And his scowl was gone. His brows no longer gathered but were upraised; his eyes were wide open in the distress of fatigue and he breathed through his mouth.

100,000 Butterflies

The most enthusiastic butterfly hunter who ever lived, a Swiss named Hans Fruhstorfer, made a wonderful collection of 100,000 butterflies, and this has been lent to the Natural History museum in Paris. He began his collection in Brazil when he was twenty-two; then took his net to Java, where he spent three years; then he followed his pursuit for two years in the Malay archipelago. He traveled through South America, Japan, China and Siam, darting about with that abstracted look of the butterfly-hunter here, there and everywhere until he had brought his net over some of the rarest creations in the world. His 100,000 specimens have nearly 7,000 varieties.

First to Adopt Christianity

The Armenians, not the Romans, were the first people to adopt Christianity as a national religion, says Collier's Weekly. The Armenian king, Tiridates, established the Georgian Armenian (Christian) church in 301, which was 33 years before Constantine proclaimed Christianity as the state religion of the Roman empire.

Old Age Pensions
Does Lashing Do Good?
Those Cosmic Rays
6,000-Year-Old Graves

Financial conservatism is agitated because old-age pensions as planned, moderately, by the President, would cost one billion dollars a year. Conservatism might better worry about Doctor Townsend's plan to give two hundred dollars a month to everybody past sixty years of age, and cost at least twenty-four thousand millions a year.

Conservatism might also worry about billions spent uselessly in state, national or local government costs, and taxes that run above thirteen thousand million dollars a year.

At Wilmington, Del., three young men, eighteen, twenty and twenty-three years old, were lashed in public, a crowd of one hundred looking on.

After the lashing, on the bare back, the youths began ten-year prison sentences for burglary. The lash frightens criminals more than imprisonment, as was proved in London, where an epidemic of "garrotting" ended as soon as the lash was used. But what will be the mental state of those young men when they leave prison after long association with experienced criminals, and constant brooding on the humiliation and pain of the lashing?

Can it be hoped that they will be reformed, or be anything except confirmed criminals, and enemies of society?

A learned German says he has discovered the source of "cosmic rays" that bombard all space, constantly passing through your body, although you don't know it, driven by the terrific energy of billions of volts. The professor suggests that the bombardment may occasionally break down a few of the atoms in the human body, thus slowly changing heredity.

That sounds like a great deal of trouble, to change heredity, which depends, really, on the right girl choosing the right kind of father for her children.

Doctor Sukenik, professor of archeology in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, has discovered graves six thousand years old, that go far back of Moses and Job and others well known.

These graves were dug, and filled, long before the Jewish nation had made Jerusalem their principal city, when other, earlier races inhabited the site of "old Jerusalem."

Talking into a telephone in the White House, with amplifiers at the other end, the President greeted six hundred members of the Holland society, at dinner in New York. He felt pride in contributions made to this country by the men of Holland through three hundred years. The Roosevelts are of Dutch origin, but unlike his distant cousin, Theodore Roosevelt, the President did not recite any childish Dutch poems about cows in "the kopjes." To know what the old Hollanders really were, as fighters and "stayers," read Motley.

Names that sound strange to Western ears figure in the case of Tony Fon Lew, "Chinese doll bride." She and her alleged father, Mr. Gin Lem, are accused of arranging marriages, taking money, and then not marrying.

Mr. Kack Lew Gee, angry Chinese merchant, says he paid $1,800 to marry the toy bride, but got no bride. Other interesting names figure in a discussion that almost caused war between the Los Angeles Hop Sing Tong and the Four Families Association.

Chinese names sound strange to our ears, but Jones or Robinson would sound ridiculous to the Chinese. Fon Lew and her pretended father ran away to China, but will be brought back and Gin Lem will be tried for violating the Mann act. An accusation that will always puzzle him.

The Saar plebiscite, as was certain in advance, proves to be superficially a victory for Hitler. In reality, it proves the devotion of Germans to Germany under any conditions.

With the population of the Saar more than 95 per cent German, voters were asked whether they wished once more to resume German citizenship, throw in their lot with France, or remain suspended in the air as wards of the League of Nations. It was certain that Germans would vote for Germany.

Our national defense authorities are delighted because a great American navy plane labeled XP2H-1 flew nonstop to the Canal Zone from Norfolk, 2,000 miles, in 25 hours. Amelia Earhart recently flew 2,400 miles in 19 hours, alone, without sleep.

And a Russian plane has flown 7,500 miles nonstop.

Uncle Sam, to equal Russia, need only multiply that 2,000-mile nonstop flight by three, and add 1,500 miles to the total.

California has horse racing with gambling. Great crowds attend the track, and the total betting in the pari-mutuel system is heavy. The state will get part of the money, not a great deal, citizens will lose their money, and the gentlemen of the race track will walk away after each season with large sums supplied by citizens of California.

BRITAIN PLANTING TREES

About 50,000,000 trees are to be planted in the United Kingdom by the forestry commissioners this winter, providing employment for about 3,500 men.

The total area is 21,000 acres, of which 13,000 are in England and Wales and 8,000 in Scotland. About 750 acres are to be added to the New forest, called "New" because it was planted by William the Conqueror in the Eleventh century, and 600 acres to the forest of Dean. The largest forests, totaling 3,400 acres, will be planted in the northeastern counties.

Doctors Know!
. . . and they use liquid laxatives

You'd use a liquid, too, if you knew how much better it makes you feel.

A liquid laxative can always be taken in the right amount. You can gradually reduce the dose. Reduced dosage is the secret of real and safe relief from constipation.

Just ask your own doctor about this. Ask your druggist how popular liquid laxatives have become. The right liquid laxative gives the right kind of help—and the right amount of help. When the dose is repeated, instead of more each time, you take less. Until the bowels are moving regularly and thoroughly without aid.

People who have experienced this comfort, never return to any form of help that can't be regulated! The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara, and these are natural laxatives that form no habit. It relieves a condition of biliousness or sluggishness without upset.

To relieve your occasional upsets safely and comfortably, try Syrup Pepsin. The druggist has it.

NO WORLD COURT FOR U. S.

With adverse action this week by the Senate, United States" entrance into the world court is blocked.

This measure had been given considerable impetus by the president and was given favorable hearing in the house but met it's defeat in the upper body.

The effect of such action is far reaching. To begin with the issue had drawn adhernets and opponents among many of the great. The Famous Father Coughlin opposed it bitterly, and hundreds of telegrams flooded Washington Sunday afternoon in response to his plea. No less a luminary than Dr. Daniel A. Poling gave of his time and influence in its favor. The fact that these two ecclesiastical dignitaries were upon opposite sides shows clearly that the religious and peace loving element was divided.

The fact that the proposal was turned down does not mean that Americans are not peace loving. It does indicate, however, that among other things, Americans are sometimes inconsistent. As a result we find ourselves in a peculiar position. We are advocates of universal peace, we hate war, and yet we are not associated with any organized peace organizations. It is to be regretted that our nation has turned down an opportunity to make of itself a very potent factor in the world's peace. Other nations are looking with puzzled eyes upon us as a people. We wonder how much longer this condition will exist? It is noted with pride that Senators Black and Bankhead of Alabama voted in favor of our entrance.

Eleven Years Of Rural Service

36,750 Rural Customers Now On Company Lines

December 31st, 1934 your company completed the eleventh year of its rural electrification program, initiated for the purpose of making the conveniences of electric service more generally available to residents of rural areas in Alabama and to further the development of our state's agriculture.

In 1934 when your company began this work, the only facts available were that rural people wanted electric lights in their homes and that the company wanted to make the service available. However, it was found that use of lights alone would not make the service economical either to customers or to the company.

Therefore the first problem was to obtain information as to what farm uses electricity could be adapted satisfactorily and economically. This was done through co-operative experimental and research work with the State Agricultural Experiment station, State Agricultural Extension Service, Farm Bureau Federation and farmers throughout Alabama.

Information was obtained with reference to more than 100 different uses of electricity in rural homes and on farms. With this at hand the program was begun and carried on aggressively.

As a result of this work, electric service has been extended to more than 24,000 customers in small rural communities and along more than 2,000 miles of state highways. These customers were entirely without electric service prior to the extension of our lines. They would still be lacking in electrical conveniences except for the company's activity in behalf of rural electrification.

Today your company is servicing rural customers in 64 of Alabama's 67 counties. There is no community of 500 or more in this area which does not enjoy the conveniences of electricity. Outside of urban areas, as defined by the Federal Bureau of Census, your company is now serving 36,750 customers.

At the outset of the rural program average use of electricity by rural customers was 400 KWH a year. Despite the fact that many of the best rural lines have been transferred from the rural rate classification, present average use on the remaining lines is 973 KWH a year, or two and one half times the use in 1924.

Although expansion has been continuously to a lower density of customers per mile of line and the company has borne the entire investment of the lines, there has been a continuous reduction in rural rates. At present rural lines are serving less than 4 customers per mile of line. In November 1934, the average rate per KWH paid by the 8,329 customers was less than 5 cents per KWH.

Many Improved Appliances To See Service During 1935

Children Need More Light In February

February, the shortest month of the year, often proves to be the darkest too. Twilight falls early. Many days are cold and rainy; long evenings must be spent indoors.

As any mother knows, such close confinement is very difficult for children. They must be amused. They must be kept busy. And this means playing with toys on the floor, looking at picture books, drawing, coloring, and the like.

What a tax on little eyes—if the lighting is not ample for easy, restful seeing!

In many homes children play in the "danger zone" of poorly lighted living rooms—try to read or look at books far from a lighting fixture — strain their eyes needlessly in many other ways.

Children do not know this danger. But you, as a mother or father, should take immediate steps to prevent it.

A few extra lamps in the living room, a new outlet or so in the nursery, another table lamp — these things means so much to your children.

Let us tell you how little they cost.

245 New Industries

During the past decade, under the leadership of Thomas W. Martin, the Alabama Power Company has aided directly and indirectly in the location of 245 new industries in this state, manufacturing 105 different products with approximate capital investments of $73,000,000; a total of 27,819 employees, receiving over $23,000,000 in salaries and wages annually.

Attractive Stock Of Modern Merchandise Available For New Year

More labor saving electric appliances will be used in Alabama homes during 1935 than during any year in Alabama history. This is strongly indicated by the substantially improved demand which has marked the first month of the New Year.

Anticipating far more widespread use of all kinds of electric equipment, your company has made arrangements to assemble an unusually attractive stock of the most modern merchandise. Ranges, refrigerators, water heaters, washing machines, embodying the latest innovations and improvements together with a wide selection of small appliances, will be available to our customers.

With electric appliance prices far below peak levels, with easy financing terms, and record low rates, the time has come when almost any family in Alabama can afford these conveniences.

Appliance sales in 1934 exceeded those of 1933 by $492,192. Refrigerators sold in 1934 numbered 4,254 compared with 2,385 the preceding year. Range sales were 1,269 compared with 318, water heaters 629 compared with 86 and washing machines 659 compared with 52.

New Use For Southern Pine

Added to the recent discovery that a first class quality of newsprint can be made from Southern pine, comes the announcement that a synthetic silken yarn can be produced from the same source, and it, like the newsprint, comes from the experimental laboratory of Dr. Charles H. Herty, at Savannah. With great newsprint and rayon industries based on Southern pine and furnishing a new source of income for this section, in the future when the South recounts its benefactors, Dr. Herty will stand out prominently among those who lead the list.

Highlights Of 1934

Taxes of Alabama Power Company amounted to over $2,000,000.

Salaries and wages paid totaled approximately $2,900,000.

Persons employed numbered about 1,900.

Customers served numbered 105,000.

Supplies and materials bought, chiefly from Alabama industries and firms, cost approximately $1,500,000.

The upper design gives fine opportunty for using rick-rack braid to set off the lines of its smart V neck and spacious pockets. The lower sketch boasts a youthfully rounded neckline and jaunty capelike shoulders, and would be as pretty as can be made up in a dainty dotted swiss, edged with embroidery.

Pattern 2060 is available in sizes small, medium and large. Medium size, each apron takes one and a half yards 36-inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

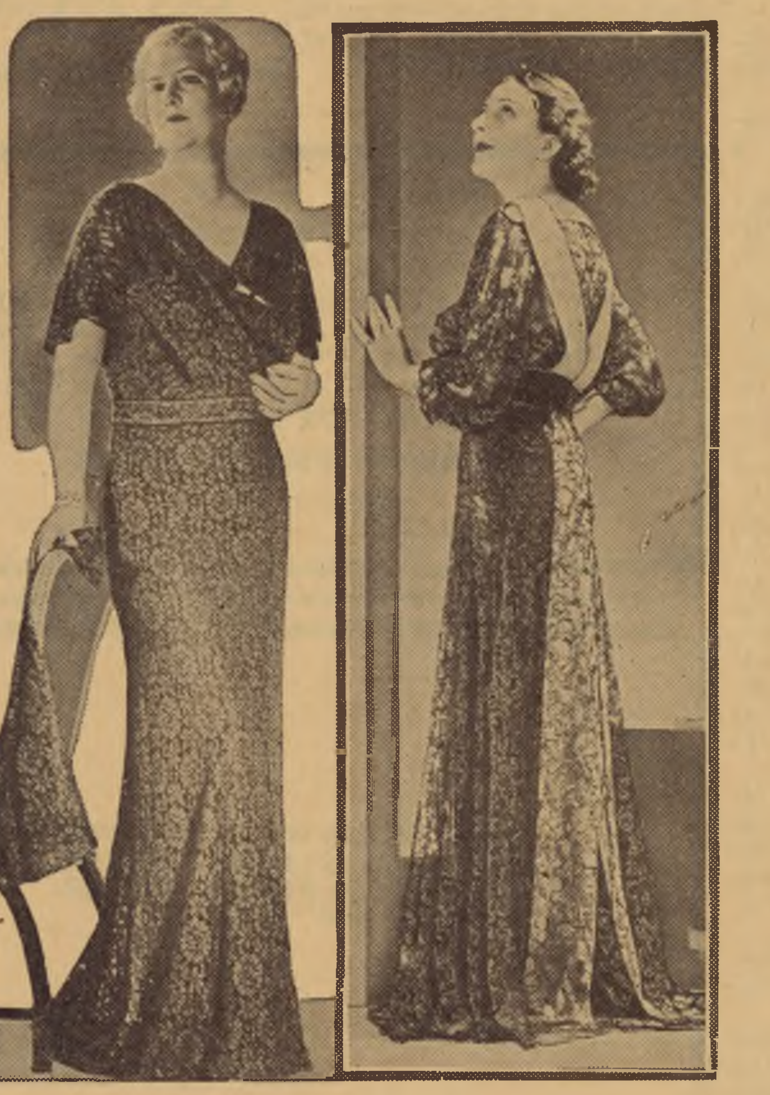
Lace, an Ideal Choice for the Matron

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



YES, the fashions paraded in style shows and pictured in newspapers and magazines are attractive enough, but they are only for slim and svelte young creatures, why don't they ever consider the needs of women who have reached forty and plus! It's a complaint, and only too often a just one, which those older are continually voicing.

Just to prove to mothers and matrons that they are not left out in the scheme of things, look what's here in the picture—two of the loveliest flattering lace gowns imaginable, for women of stately grace be they young or not so young. In spite of all the frenzied excitement over sumptuous gowns for the budding debutante, when it comes to beautiful appearance, smoothly groomed self-confident and slim-of-silhouette, daughters better look to their laurels when it comes to competing with mothers and matrons in the art of dress these days.

The fact that lace is scheduled to play so important a part in fashions coming and here, is a good omen for matrons who appreciate the magic which flattering apparel yields in erasing the years, and as every woman knows, there is nothing more flattering, more exquisitely feminizing than beautiful lace. The stately matron to the left in the picture is wearing a lace gown of high distinction. It is particularly ideal for the woman who has a limited wardrobe, for it is a rich black lace, which will give grand service the year round, winter and summer. With an eye to being practical, the designer has created a short matching jacket, making the gown as happily apropos for informal dining as for formal dancing.

Lace is also being worked into chiffon dresses very cleverly, the lace and the chiffon going fifty-fifty. A very winsome gown has a deep flounce of the lace with the same lace intricately set into the bodice and sleeves.

There are legions of novelty laces being shown in the advance displays. Most interesting are the laces which have cellophane and metal accents. Beaded laces and embroidered laces of every imaginable type are also among the showings.

Interesting news about laces includes the shirtwaist dresses which are being fashioned for resort wear and which will be good for summer wear later on. Midseason afternoon frocks in dark or bright crepes or light woolens are also trimmed with lace dyed a perfect match.

Tailored lace is also being smartly featured for afternoon wear. The laces are of a somewhat sturdy character and the ensemble idea is carried out in that there is always an accompanying jacket.

SMART SPORTWEAR

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

For fun and right smart jauntiness, look to the leather hiplength jacket. It is easy to slip into, comfy, free with action back, and inside it has a Johnny collar to keep out wintry blasts. The Scotch plaid skirt has as its predominating color, the same color of the jacket, as do the calfskin kiltie tongues that are excellent for walking. The beret adds yet another note of jauntiness.

A New Velvet

A new velvet with a pile of shiny cellophane on a silk back is recommended for making accessories, such as hats, bags, capes and evening jackets.

FASHIONS INSPIRED BY PEASANT THEMES

Peasant themes, with their lovely colorfulness and freshness, are inspiring the season's fashions. In virtually every branch of apparel there are innumerable details that bear the unmistakable imprint of peasant inspiration.

Materials, with the new fringed edges in rustic fabrics, the peasant print cottons in sports frocks, and the combinations of gay colors, like red and green, purple and pink, are distinct changes from the modern trends.

Bloused bodices and gathered skirts, belts embroidered in peasant colors and motifs, raffia, cord-tied details and heavy linen and cotton laces in accessories further establish the pre-eminence of this influence.

Trains Are Short for the Evening, Gowns Are Slit

Most likely your new evening frock will have a slit skirt to show an alluring few inches of silk-clad leg, but if it has a train, the train will be short. And it is quite likely that it may have a tunic and it may be trimmed with fur. All these points mark a lovely gown which is of dull rose taffeta with slanting shoulder straps of brown kolinsky that continue down the back to the waist. Delightful for the more mature woman is a tunic dress of plum colored Chantilly type lace with a long slim tunic and a trained skirt. There is a sash of plum-colored satin. Another tunic dress has a tunic that is pointed at the back to form an overtrim. It is of red sequins over a dull red crepe skirt.

Patou Uses Moderate Slit in His New Dress Designs

Patou has surpassed himself with the simplicity and elegance of his "little season" collection. He probably never before has designed such completely lovely things.

The lines which were felt to be a bit over-severe in his August collection have been modified into the most graceful of curves and angles, and the slits have become shorter for daytime and smartly moderate for evening.

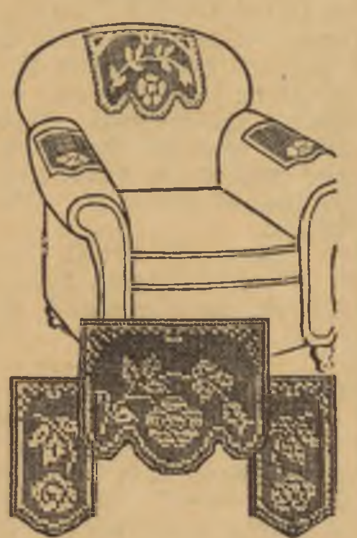
HERE'S CHAIR SET EASY TO CROCHET

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



Since crochet work is again interesting the art needleworkers, why not pick up your No. 8 or 9 steel crochet hook and thread about size 15 and crochet this attractive three-piece set for your living room chair, or for a gift? It will surely be appreciated and admired. Chair backs and arm rests are old decorations but now growing in popularity and are modern. This set is worked in the large filet stitch, works up rapidly and is simple work even for the inexperienced. The center piece measures 14x11 inches, the arm rests 6x11 inches, with about size 15 thread. By using a larger hook and crocheting looser, the finished pieces will be larger, if desired.

In the large filet an open mesh equals 1 triple crochet (thread twice over hook). Chain 3, skip 3. A solid mesh equals 5 triple crochet. Add 4 triple crochet for each additional solid mesh.

Send 10 cents to our Crochet department for directions and working diagram for this No. 805, or if you have no material you can get the entire outfit for 40c, namely, instructions, diagram, crochet hook, and sufficient cream color thread to complete the three pieces.

Address—Home Craft Co.—Dept. B—Nineteenth and St. Louis Avenue, St. Louis, Mo.

Many Making Good Use of Enforced Leisure

"My son," said the old father sending his boy out into the world, "never get into an argument with a man who pronounces words the way they are spelled."

"Why not, father?" asked the youth.

"Because," replied the old man, "a fellow who pronounces words the way they are spelled has dug out his knowledge by himself. He really knows what he is saying."

There is tremendous attendance these days on extra classes. Men and women with much idle time on their hands are seeking to turn the hours to good account. And the home work given out to them is done with amazing faithfulness. Those who have been subjected to such discipline can reasonably expect success when jobs are to be had.

Quite as important are those who are struggling to master subjects by themselves. A young man who recently completed his course for a degree made up his mind that there were several subjects he would like to learn. He started on stenography, typewriting and accounting, on his own. Rising early, he devotes at least eight hours daily to such study. His example has stimulated others. Two have joined him. It is a home-made extension course. The graduate of such a school has no certificate, but he should have sufficient power to do without one—Boston Globe.

Do Not Cook Cheese

"Cheese should not be cooked," Doris W. McCray says in Hygeia Magazine, in discussing the acceptance of cheese by the American Medical association's committee on foods. "It may be melted in a sauce or may be added grated, after the food is removed from the fire. Too high temperature or too long cooking causes the fat to melt and drop out of cheese, leaving the toughened mass of protein, which is stringy and rubbery."

HUMANENESS TO LOWER ANIMALS GROWS IN ITALY

Cruelty to animals in Italy is far less apparent than it used to be, and the shooting of small birds is not quite so popular a sport, writes the Rome correspondent of the London Sunday Observer. The example given by Signor Mussolini in making a bird sanctuary of Capri had an effect on public opinion, and there was an attractive ceremony in the Giardino del Lago last year, when about 1,000 caged birds were given their liberty.

Animals in Italy were protected under the law of 1913, which stipulates severe penalties for maltreatment of animals. There are also restrictions with regard to vivisection, and steps are being taken to make the killing of animals in slaughter houses as humane as possible.

"There are 2,200 international societies for the protection of animals registered with the League of Nations," says Giuseppe Gregorac, president of the Federation of Italian and Rome Societies for the Protection of Animals. It is obviously a question that no longer only concerns hysterical old ladies. Young and old are combining in defense of animals.

The main difficulty, however, he said, was that among the eighteen Italian societies in Italy, only two or three were financially well provided for. The Rome society, for instance, cnly receives about £33 a year from the public in subscriptions. The Rome municipality, however, gives a subsidy, as it is realized that the society does good educative work, and also that the lack of care that has been taken in previous years with regard to animals in Italy has created a bad impression among British and other foreign visitors.

CHILD CONVICTS

Although this country long ago accepted the principle that the child offender should be provided with educational and correctional advantages instead of being imprisoned with hardened criminals, many states still send youngsters under fifteen years of age to the penitentiary. A recent case in point was that of a boy of twelve sent to prison for life. —Freling Foster in Collier's Weekly.

COLLEGE NIGHT FUNDS FOR STUDENT LOANS

The Student Executive Board of Alabama College has announced that the proceeds of the College Night program, February 22 and 23, will be used for a scholarship loan fund.

In the early history of College Night the proceeds were used for a gift to the winning side, which in turn transferred it as a rule to the institution. The custom in recent years has been for the Executive Board to present the gift to the college following the performance. Last year lamps for the steps of Palmer Hall were presented.

Advocate Repeal of City, County Gasoline Levies

Montgomery, Ala.—Sentiment has appeared among Aabama legislators for the elimination of all county and city taxes on gasoline and for giving the cities and counties a share of the revenue from the state gasoline tax.

High collection costs, tax evasion, and difficulities of administration and law enforcement are said to have reduced the revenue from these local gasoine taxes substantially. Reports indicate also that many localities have substained severe trade losses, particularly in retail sales, because of the tendency of Alabama motorists to buy in communities where no local gasoline tax is levied.

Hotel proprietors have informed legislators that county and city gasoline taxes have hurt their business, and that highway travelers are detouring the "high tax" areas. Retail gasoline dealers similarly have been affected, according to report. In some communities service stations have been closed becaus econsumers were buying outside city limits, or in other towns..

It is believed that were the state to allocate a share of its own gasoline tax collections to cities and counties, they would receive proportionately a larger net income and yet the average consumer would save about 1c per gallon in taxes. Under present conditions, in some sections the cumulative federal, state, county and city tax rates exceed the price of gasoline!

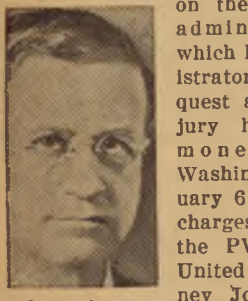
Grand Jury Asked by Ickes to Investigate PWA Graft Charges—Future of NRA Hangs Upon Outcome of Suit Against Little Sawmill Operator.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.



Sec'y Ickes

"HONEST HAROLD" Ickes has been subjected to lots of abuse by congressmen and others, but he does not intend to let anything be put over on the Public Works administration, of which he is the administrator. At his request a special grand jury has been summoned to meet in Washington on February 6 to inquire into charges of graft in the PWA. Assistant United States Attorney John W. Fihelly has the matter in hand for the government and will present first testimony concerning the $4,000,000 canal project in Texas. It was asserted that the contract for this project was withdrawn after Mr. Ickes' investigators had uncovered evidence that there was a huge conspiracy to defraud the United States. Eight or ten persons, including federal officials, are said to be involved. Mr. Ickes himself said:

"The Public Works administration investigation division has made a long and careful study of the Texas project upon the direction of the administrator (Ickes) and presented to the proper prosecuting officials of the government a full report for such action as they deem proper to take."

This Texas case may consume several weeks, and afterward the grand jury is expected to investigate some other projects and also charges of fraud in the War department.

ALMOST unnoticed among the spectacular issues of the day, yet of momentous importance, the case of the United States against Belcher will be set for hearing by the Supreme court within a few days. This case opens up discussion on the constitutionality of the heart of the entire NRA experiment—the power of the federal government to regulate wages and working hours through codes.

Upon this refusal of a small Alabama sawmill operator to comply with the code hangs the entire fate of the NRA, for if the government loses there will be nothing left of NRA except an empty statement of desirable business ethics. If the government cannot control wages and hours in the production of goods intended for interstate commerce, there is a strong likelihood that the course of legislation to extend the NRA beyond June 16 will be strongly affected. Other cases now pending before the court touch upon certain portions of the vital question, but this case goes straight to the basic power of the recovery act. It affords a clear-cut determination of the fundamental issues, because there is no dispute as to facts, no technicalities of law upon which the issue can be avoided. The case comes almost as an original case, since the attorney general took advantage of legal machinery permitting an appeal directly to the Supreme court from the decision of a federal District court without recourse to a Court of Appeals.

The defendant openly violated the lumber code. Instead of adhering to code provision requiring payment of 24 cents per hour for a 40-hour maximum week, he admitted paying his men 10 to 15 cents per hour and that he worked them as many hours as he saw fit.

What the government's line of defense will be is not known. The case involves all the constitutional objections which might be raised against the recovery act. Decisions of the court in the recent oil cases did not touch upon the constitutionality of the main body of the act, but involved only a special section.

WHEN the senate passes the $4,000,000,000 work relief measure, as it certainly will after all the orators get through, there need be no fussing as to who is to administer the huge fund. President Roosevelt himself, according in an authority high in administration circles, will undertake that job and will allocate the money to the various agencies as he sees fit. There will be no new set-up for this purpose, unless it may be a small group of advisors selected by Mr. Roosevelt. These may be members of the cabinet or technical experts—more likely the latter. This information was given the senate finance committee as it began consideration of the bill, and was designed to quiet some of the opposition and also to curb the ambition of certain gentlemen who had hoped to handle the $4,000,000,000. It did not, however, silence those senators of both parties who still contend that too much power is given the President when he is handed such a vast sum to dispose of as he pleases.

A strong possibility is seen that the bill may be split into two separate parts, so that the 880 million dollars needed for relief purposes may be passed without delay, and the senate can then take its time in considering the extraordinary measure which gives the President such unprecedented powers in spending the four billion dollars.

Part of the money may be used to put the government into the filling station business, Senator Elmer Thomas (Dem., Okla.) revealed. Gasoline stations may be erected along "self-liquidating" highways, he said. The government may also purchase land adjoining these highways and improve it with houses for rent or sale.

Little hope is seen in reporting the measure out before February 10 when the relief funds on hand will expire. The only hope of meeting this emergency, it is pointed out, is in the possible segregation of the 880 million dollar cash relief provision from the main bill.

One development which was of interest to many was that the measure was prepared under the supervision of Mr. Bell, the budget director, thus making him a candidate for the "physical hanging" advocated by Senator James Couzens of Michigan.

FEARING the anger of their aroused constituents more than the administration's whip, the senate kicked over the traces to defeat ratification of the world court protocols. The final count was seven votes short of the necessary two-thirds.

Frantic efforts to force the measure through were made by the administration. Several revolting senators were called to the White House, and the President even agreed to amendments to the resolution, but was unable to overcome the effects of thousands of protesting telegrams which had been pouring into Washington from citizens all over the country.

In private, many Democratic senators who face re-election in 1936 heaved sighs of relief as the measure was defeated. Administration forces accepted the verdict, apparently without rancor, although the long memory of the man in the White House is well known. Seemingly the issue is dead, for the present at least.

Senator William Borah, who with Senator Hiram Johnson, led the attack on ratification, was jubilant over the outcome, declaring that it was a great victory for the American people and for this country's traditional policy of keeping aloof from foreign entanglements.

Observers at the capital refused to view the world court vote as any indication of a spreading revolt against Roosevelt's policies, since the court controversy cut deeper than party lines. Several senators who opposed the tribunal will undoubtedly support the administration on other measures, although victory of the small band of irreconcilables who led the fight has undoubtedly added to their prestige.

Huey Long

THAT serio-comic "civil war" in Huey Long's domain is becoming more serious than comical and almost any day may develop into real warfare. It was centered for the present at the state capital. Two hundred armed men, directed by leaders of the Square Deal association, seized the parish court house in East Baton Rouge and held it until assured that one of their friends who had been arrested was released. They then dispersed with a warning from one John Appel to "be sure you have enough ammunition and be ready for the call at any time."

The Kingfish was in New Orleans at the time, but he hastened to Baton Rouge while Governor Allen called out some troops and proclaimed partial martial law in the capital. Huey immediately ordered the recently appointed Judge J. D. Womack to start an investigation of what he described as a plot to murder him, in which "four sheriffs and a district attorney" were involved. The senator declared:

"We picked up two men, one of them was going to drive the murder car. It was all fixed up. He was going to block my car on the highway between here and New Orleans, make it stop and force me in the ditch, and then 14 or 16 were going to come along in another car and kill me.

"We found all the stuff in the fellow's car. There was sheriff's equipment, and everything."

Maybe Huey was right, for one Sidney Songy testified at the inquiry that he had been given a gun, ammunition and gas bombs to kill the senator.

Long blamed the Standard Oil company for the armed assembly of his enemies in Baton Rouge and said that unless the company stopped the "violence" his compromise with it over the 5-cent oil refinery tax would be called off.

Despite this warning another armed group of Square Dealers gathered at the Baton Rouge air field; but someone betrayed them and a detachment of the National Guard advanced on them in battle array. The sight of machine guns was enough for the citizenry; they surrendered, and were disarmed.

THOSE who view Russia's growing military strength with alarm were not comforted by a statement made by the vice commissar for defense before the seventh All-Union congress of Soviets in Moscow that the Red army has grown from 600,000 to 940,000 men in four years.

Fortifications along the eastern and western frontiers have been strengthened, and all branches of the military service, particularly aviation, have been increased, the vice commissar stated, and more will be spent for defense in 1935 than was spent last year. The delegates, who were meeting to review Bolshevist progress since 1931, greeted the vice commissar's speech with roars of applause.

Bruno Hauptmann

IN AN effort to build up an alibi for Bruno Richard Hauptmann his attorneys have called a strange collection of witnesses—a minor league bootlegger, a speakeasy operator of various names, a young Swede whose stories have been somewhat vague and conflicting, and a man who has admitted that he served several jail sentences—a not particularly impressive lot upon which to depend when you are fighting to escape death in the electric chair.

One of the peculiarities of the trial is the number of persons who only saw Hauptmann for a few minutes or seconds, but who are able to identify him more than two years later. The man accused of killing the first Lindbergh child is not outstanding in appearance or one who would be likely to indelibly impress himself on a person's mind, but both the state and the defense have been able to produce persons who swear he was the man they saw the day the crime was committed.

The battle of handwriting experts has also begun, with the state producing experts to swear that the handwriting on the ransom notes does not resemble that on the admitted writing of Hauptmann. Their statements are just as positive as were those made by the defense witnesses, and it all proves just a little confusing to the jury.

Considerable comment was caused when one of the jurors, a woman, smiled broadly at Hauptmann as he left the stand following his examination, and some wagers have been made that a hung jury will be the outcome of the trial. Such predictions are hardly in order, since a single bit of testimony may yet change the entire course of the case.

DURING the debate in the house on an administration bill to increase by $9,000,000,000 the amount of long-term securities the treasury can issue, Representative Reed of New York quoted Secretary Morgenthau as saying that the treasury could not finance the work relief program unless congress broadened its bond-issuing authority. So the house passed the measure at once.

The bill, prepared by the Treasury department, places the administration squarely against inflation. It provides authority to raise money necessary for the public works, social security and similar measures, meet federal deficits, and might even be used to provide funds for payment of the soldiers' bonus.

Under provisions of the measure there would be ten-year bonds in amounts as small as $25, and as explained by the Treasury department, would be sold below par. There would be no interest, but each six months the bonds would appreciate in value at the rate of 2½ per cent, plus compounded earnings.

Huge sums are involved: first, the creation of a revolving bond authorization fund of $2,500,000,000; and second, the consolidation of the two present revolving funds of $10,000,000,000 each into a joint $20,000,000,000 fund for bills, certificates and notes.

JAPANESE forces continued to advance in their drive. Two towns were captured by troops operating in weather 34 degrees below zero, and the forces appear to be converging on an area of disputed territory which lies south of Manchuli and Hailar, where northwest Manchukou overlaps Outer Mongolia. The indefiniteness of the border is blamed for the contention.

Intimations that the Japanese garrison in Manchukou might be increased were made in the Japanese diet, based upon assertions that the Soviet government had continued to enlarge its army in the Far East, and that Soviet penetration into Outer Mongolia has resulted in virtual communization of that territory.

There has been no decided change in the attitude of Chinese leaders toward Japan. Recent interviews with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek were said to have brought about no accord between the two nations. Meanwhile the Far East continues to be one of the interesting news spots on the map today.

RICHARD WASHBURN CHILD, former ambassador to Italy, attorney, and author, died of pneumonia at his home in New York. He left a post as editor of Collier's Weekly in 1921 to take that of Ambassador to Italy, where he gained prominence as the chief representative of the United States at the Genoa and Lausanne conferences in 1922.

He was the author of several works and collaborated with Premier Benito Mussolini on the Italian leader's autobiography in 1927.

Social Security

Washington.—At last after years of talking, a social security program is before congress. And now that it is before congress there is a brand new outburst of talk, because it seems the "social securers" never can agree among themselves. The result is that leadership in the house and in the senate is trying vainly to follow administration instructions, and has run afoul of all kinds of difficulties. The end is not yet, but it is safe to say without fear of any necessity for retraction that the social security program will not go back to President Roosevelt as a law in the form it was presented as an administration bill.

I find everywhere among those not charged with responsibility for the social security legislation that there is much confusion and lack of understanding as to what the President has proposed. It is easily understood. Any time that it requires thirty thousand words to explain a piece of legislation obviously that legislation must be complex. To comprehend what the length of Mr. Roosevelt's social security message is, it is only necessary, I think, to remind readers that the message with its explanation of the legislation would fill approximately thirty-five columns of an ordinary newspaper. Many persons naturally will fall asleep before they wade through that much material.

But, let us attempt to summarize the social security bill. It provides, first, for a national system of compulsory contributory old age insurance; second, it authorizes appropriations to be used as federal subsidies (plain gifts) to the individual states to help them pension the aged who cannot be brought under an insurance system predicated upon their service in commerce and industry and, third, a voluntary system of old age annuities is set up.

The system of compulsory contributory old age insurance is designed to protect those who are no longer able to work but who have done their turn on the payrolls of industry. An old age fund is set up in the Treasury of the United States. Initially, the money comes from the Treasury but thereafter there is a tax operating on payrolls of all those who employ workers in numbers exceeding four. This tax will start January 1, 1937, at a rate of 1 per cent. It is increased to 2 per cent as of January 1, 1492; 3 per cent as of January 1, 1947; 4 per cent as of January 1, 1952, and 5 per cent after January 1, 1957. The employer pays the tax but he collects half of it by a deduction from the payroll of the individual worker.

The age of sixty-five years is fixed as the time when a worker shall retire and receive this pension. The pensioner can receive as much as $30 a month. If the individual dies before retirement, his dependents receive back the amount paid in in his behalf.

As a part of the old age pension system the legislation sets up an old age fund in which workers may purchase an annuity but they never may acquire more than a total of $9,000 maturity value—the ultimate amount—from which their income may be increased.

Then there is the much discussed unemployment insurance. This also is predicated upon a tax on industrial payrolls but it is a state proposition. That is, the federal government is attempting to encourage individual states to enact legislation which will protect the worker in periods such as that through which we have passed since 1929. In other words, this phase of the legislation is designed to cause workers and their employers to lay aside a certain percentage of their income while they are employed, to be used when times are hard.

There are countless subdivisions in the bill, none of which are simple, that seek to protect the many who for one reason or another do not qualify under the general terms of the legislation. For instance, aid to dependent children is provided. Federal health subsidies—a kind of health insurance—is proposed. Maternal aid is arranged, and extraordinary cases are covered, such as aid to crippled children. There are other subdivisions much too intricate to analyze here for the reason that their application is decidedly limited. The drafters of the legislation sought to cover all. Whether they have done so can be determined only after the legislation has been in operation some years.

Counting the Cost

I have been unable to compute the cost of this legislation to the federal and state government and no one, of course, can approximate the expense it will be to industry. It is one of those things so far reaching in its effect as to make utterly impossible advance calculations of the cost in dollars and cents. Suffice it to say that all through the bill as it now wends its way through legislative channels are frequent paragraphs where money either is appropriated or authorized to be appropriated in the future. One wag covered the money phases of the bill the other day with a remark that it was not unlike the conversations between Amos and Andy, the radio comedians, for there is five million, three million, twenty million, seventy-eight million and so on through the list.

Yet it is not the money phases that constitute the difficulties in the legislation as the leaders in congress see them. The bill sets up an intricate system of administration against which even the present far flung list of New Deal agencies pales into insignificance.

First, there is the ponderous organization for administration to be created here in Washington. Beneath that there are state organizations in every state, regional and county organizations and even city administrative bureaus. I think it takes no stretch of the imagination to foresee how many workers will be necessary to do just the plain chores of keeping a record of all the individuals on the government payrolls, federal and state, for administration of this legislation.

Here in Washington, we will have a social insurance board, a group of three members, receiving $10,000 a year each and serving for six years. The federal emergency relief administrator will have duties to perform in conjunction with the social insurance board as well as apart from it. The secretary of labor is given jurisdiction over some phases of the administration and the public health service is charged with conduct of the health insurance phases.

This is not all. The secretary of the treasury is charged with the management and investment of all of the monies under the various funds and it is he who must see that they are properly disbursed.

* * *

Jealousy Aroused

In congress, considerable jealousy has arisen among committee chairmen, party wheel-horses and those who would enjoy being administration spokesmen. Some of them, it hardly need be said, believe their political salvation lies in following the administration blindly and in addition there is another segment of legislators who keep their eyes on the historical significance of passing events. This group wants to have a leading part in enactment of the social security legislation because, it must be said, this is the greatest of all experiments undertaken at any time by the American government. From lobby conversation it is perfectly evident that there are many men in the house and senate who would be willing to retire to whatever rewards their political service has given them only to become known as the father of the social security legislation.

This condition has precipitated several humorous circumstances. Senator Wagner of New York sponsored the legislation in the senate and Representative Lewis of Maryland proposed it in the house. Senator Wagner's committee arranged to start hearings on a stated date in the senate and that date was announced rather suddenly. No sooner had the Wagner committee hearings been announced than Representative Doughton of North Carolina scheduled similar hearings before his ways and means committee in the house. He set the hearings one day ahead of the senate and the rivalry between the two for headline witnesses has been, to say the least, a source of many jokes.

Trouble Ahead

Some weeks ago I reported to you that there were rumblings of difficulties ahead for the President's gigantic public works program, as his new experiment in recovery efforts is described. He asked congress for a lump sum of $4,800,000,000 with which to revive the heavy industries and other lines of commercial endeavor that they may absorb some of those unemployed now on relief rolls. It will be remembered that in his annual message to congress he said with emphasis that federal aid to the destitute must stop; that the giving of relief directly was a state responsibility.

The first hitch encountered by the administration wheel-horses in guiding the public works bill through congress developed in the house when the leaders, anxious to pass the legislation as the White House dictated, sought a special rule which limited debate to a couple of hours and made it almost impossible for individual members to amend the bill. Several scores of Democrats and all of the Republicans balked. For several days the house leaders fought gallantly to keep the stubborn opposition from running away with things, but the defections from the Democratic ranks became so large that a compromise had to be offered. It was accepted and the Republican critics and Democratic opponents were successfully squelched.

One result of the near revolt against the house Democratic leadership was the exposition of feeling against Secretary Ickes of the Department of the Interior who also carries the titles of public works administrator and oil administrator. A lot of Democrats dislike Mr. Ickes for what they call his political aloofness. Apparently he has not yielded to their demands for patronage appointments and naturally men seeking elective offices hold out that plum as bait to voters.

A Baby Grows Up
Senate's Good News
Five Little Girls
$4,880,000,000

Fifty-three years ago a good American mother, weak, but happy, received in her arms a small baby, with pink face and little hair. That baby now lives in the White House, face bronzed by ocean air, hair thick at fifty-three years of age.

The baby has grown to be Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States.

One hundred and twenty-five million Americans are grateful to his mother, who, happily, has lived to see her son move up, from the cradle in which she first placed him, to earth's most important place among men.

Congratulations and thanks, first of all, to President Roosevelt's mother; good wishes, congratulations and a long life to President Roosevelt.

The people of the United States are to be congratulated that by the decision of the senate they will not be pushed into the back door of the League of Nations through the World court.

Mr. Hull, secretary of state, wanted the United States to go into the World court and submit important matters affecting this country to foreign judges appointed by nations that have swindled this country out of ten thousand million dollars. Why, in heaven's name?

Those marvelous Canadian babies, the Dionne quintuplets, eight months old, are healthy, happy, each one a separate little lady of intense individuality. All pretty, all intelligent, with good foreheads, well-shaped heads. What a wonderful family! It seems almost a pity that they cannot remain babies, now, and above, through all eternity.

The house of representatives, 329 to 78, gives the President four thousand eight hundred and eighty million dollars, to be spent in accordance with his best judgment to fight depression and unemployment.

In early days the little, "small change" eighty million dollars, tacked on at the end of the large figure, would have astounded the country, for in those days millions were respectable units. Now our government unit is the billion—one thousand millions. When will the trillion start its career? The printing press could bring it.

Not content with being reduced from a great empire to a small "backyard" by the last Hapsburg, Austria thinks it wants another emperor and Prince Starhemberg will say when little Prince Otto shall mount the throne. That will mean unhappiness, eventually for the young prince, and a good actor spoiled for Hollywood.

Gen. William Mitchell, commander of all our flying force in the big war, knows more about national defense than anybody in this country. He writes to a friend seventy years old, as follows:

"During your lifetime have come the electric telegraph and telephone, the gasoline engine with its accompaniment of automotive vehicles, the airplane and submarine. The world is now only one-sixth as large as when you appeared. If this development goes on, it is difficult to say what may take place in the next seventy years. Will the biological supremacy of the yellow races dominate, or will the military supremacy, so far, of the white race be able to maintain our culture and standards? The world is growing so small and so increasingly populated that one or the other will undoubtedly become master."

Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, whose father collected pictures and other works of art, has decided to sell six pictures. The price asked is said to be $1,500,000. The older J. P. Morgan evidently bought good pictures. Two of the six pictures, already sold to the Metropolitan museum, are a portrait of "Anne of Austria," by Peter Paul Rubens, and an altar piece by Filippo Lippi. Nobody knows how much was paid originally for either picture.

A rare ten-dollar gold piece, that sold at auction for $530, might offer a suggestion for government profit. At that rate, our $8,000,000,000 worth of gold could be changed into $400,000,000,000 worth, nearly all profit. Who could contradict the government if it said that was the value?

Industrialists that put 25,000,000 automobiles on the roads in this country helped their government last year. The federal tax on gasoline alone paid more than $170,000,000.

Col. Roscoe Turner, who does all sorts of things with airplanes, plans a real flight around the earth, 25,000 miles, following the equator all the way, starting at Panama.

This will be the first real "around the world" flight, the others having been flights around the northern end of the world, a flight that grows smaller as you go farther north. Equatorial heat will not bother Colonel Turner. In a plane you can pick out the altitude and the temperature that you want.

SYNOPSIS

Thought of the rules swept the crowd, because Duval was edging to the right. He moved slowly, awkwardly, at the cost of great effort, on toward the center of the log. Was he trying one more trick? Not likely. A man under such a strain does not attempt strategy . . . not fair strategy. As he progressed an inch at a time Elliott countered by also creeping toward the center so his end might not dip beneath the surface.

Both men had their arms extended and Elliott's grin had faded to a sort of curious smile, a speculative alertness. . . . Close and closer they came together and then, as their extended hands were all but touching, Duval suddenly flecked his right wrist in a pass at Elliott's left hand.

"Ah, th' dirty—" But Bird-Eye's high scream was cut short by an ominous roar. The Bull, facing defeat, had overstepped all rules. The slightest touch on the other's body would upset his balance, now, and after Elliott had proven himself above taking what was even recognized as a fair advantage, the last vestige of loyalty to town or whatever it was which had put men on Duval's side was whisked away.

On Duval's face was ruthlessness along with the flush of fatigue and humiliation. He would be the last man on that log, though disqualified for any prize. At any cost he would stay on that log.

But would he? Elliott, a steely quality coming into his grin, retreated until he was out of the other's reach. The log sank beneath him but he did not slow his cadence despite the fact that he ran in water. He loosed the last reservoir of his energy and by the way his feet flickered and clawed and spurned that log one might well have believed that until now he had only played with this crowned king of the river that flowed past Tincup.

Watchers felt their middles aching as they followed those straining contestants. Again the Bull sought to strike Elliott's extended hand and missed by inches. His left hand raised jerkily, up and up. His body tilted. His great torso was twisting, wrenching at the hips, and, seeing this, Elliott leaped high, came down running, sent water sloshing back and forth the length of the stick until with a throaty cry of rage and humiliation, of hatred and jealousy, the great Bull, missing a stride, went sideways and backward, disappeared beneath the surface of the pond with a mighty splash and came up blowing and shaking his black-thatched head.

Hats went into the air, then, along with yips and yells and enthusiastic oaths as Ben Elliott, panting heavily, brought the log to a stop and, hands on his knees, stood blowing and grinning and watched the man whose title he had taken swim for the boom sticks.

The Bull slunk quickly toward the boiler room of the mill, water streaming from his pants and sleeves. The pond man threw out his pike pole and brought the cedar log to shore and there Birney, the announcer and master of ceremonies, greeted Elliott with a clap on the back and, with the other hand, thrust a roll of currency at him.

"Here's your money and you sure deserve it!" he cried, close in Ben's ear to make himself heard. "You'd got it on a foul, anyhow. Better this way!"

Bird-Eye grasped his hand and shook it with congratulations as profane as they were shrill. Others surged around the victor and Elliott accepted this homage modestly.

"Luck!" he said to one enthusiastic well-wisher. "I got the breaks in luck."

"Luck be domned!" shrilled Bird-Eye. "I'll lick any mon ave me own old or me own heavy who says 'twas luck! You got stuff, me b'y; you got guts!"

"Thanks, chum!" Elliott laughed. "I hope you don't find me out!"

He shouldered his way slowly to his pack-sack and, surrounded by his admirers, with Bird-Eye in the fore, changed to his shoes again. He had the usual run of questions to answer that is the lot of any winner in a spectacular contest and he did it with that amiable grin, with his marked modesty and yet with a likeable frankness.

He looked about for Don Stuart, craning his neck to see over the crowd which was now moving up toward Tincup's main thoroughfare.

"Who ye mean?" Bird-Eye asked. "Owld Donny?"

"Yeah. Stuart. The old duffer's broke, on top of being sick, and I want to look out for him."

A man at his elbow said cautiously: "I'm afeerd old Don won't do much visitin' in Tincup." Bird-Eye turned to him inquiringly and the man nodded. "Brandon. He found him here while th' birlin' was goin' on. He's likely made other arrangements."

Bird-Eye's face reflected concern; the other man's a cynical acceptance of some unpleasant fact.

"Th' dirty stinker!" Bird-Eye said beneath his breath. "So he's drivin' him out already, is he? Well, th' low down—"

"Who's driving who out?" Elliott asked.

"Misther Brandon. Americky moight be a free country but Tincup ain't in it, thin. Owld Donny ain't welcome here 'nd 't's likely he's got his orders to move on."

Elliott hitched his pack-sack higher.

"What's this? Orders? What's wrong with him? Seemed like a harmless old gaffer to me. Bent on coming to Tincup, too; wanted it like a little kid wants candy. Got my goat. . . . Who's going to run him off?"

Bird-Eye had hopped nimbly to a log from which point he could see across bobbing heads.

Elliott craned his neck and could see, half-way to the depot, two men on the sidewalk. One was his companion in travel earlier that day; the other a man he had not seen before. The latter had Don Stuart by one arm but that contact was not the friendly assistance which Ben had offered the old fellow. As Elliott looked, the feeble old man tried to draw away but the other was insistent, scarcely hesitated in his progress toward the station.

"Train west's due now," Bird-Eye said. "Sure, 'nd pore owld Donny, he'll be a passenger. It's a cryin' shame, kapin' him away from Tincup so!"

Elliott started forward, Bird-Eye at his heels, crossing the street, leaping to the high board sidewalk and swinging on.

He overtook the two he followed just in time to hear Stuart gasp:

"—ain't long to . . . live, Nick. I'd like . . . stay here. . . . Ain't pleasant to . . . be sick and not . . . among friends."

"Never mind," the other said as one might to a protesting child. "I've told you any number of times to stay away."

On this reply Elliott moved abreast of the man.

"Hello, old timer!" he said, addressing Stuart. "Going some place?"

He did not look at the man said to be Nicholas Brandon. His manner on the question was almost casual.

Then Elliott looked at Brandon. A man of undeterminate age; not old, neither young. Powerfully built, with a peculiarly white face and eyes as black as night. Those eyes bored into Elliott's now, keenly, intelligently, with the look of a man who is accustomed to gauging others without delay or hesitation; they were the eyes of a man who knows men, the glance of one accustomed to rule men.

"Oh, this man doesn't want you to stay!" Ben said softly. And then with a smile, to Brandon: "I sort of took the old timer under my wing today. He wants to stay here quite badly. I'll look after him."

"There's no place for him here," Brandon said positively. "Come, Stuart, it's almost train time."

He twitched at the old man's arm but Ben broke in, brow wrinkled as if he wanted to handle a perplexing matter fairly.

"Well, now, say! No place? Suppose a place was made for him a few days? I'd sort of planned on that. There's a hotel here, and I'd be willing to—"

"I don't know you," Brandon interrupted and irritability crept into his voice. "I've never even seen you. I've known this man for years. He's an old employee of mine. This is my affair. I never have others, especially strangers, meddling."

"Yeah. I am butting in, I guess. But . . . You see, the old timer told me a little about himself. He's been lonesome a long time, I take it. He's not what you'd call in robust health. I figure that if I was in his shape I'd like to be with a few old friends myself and if—"

In the distance a train whistled and on the sound Brandon's eyes snapped.

"I've not time to argue my affairs," he said sharply. "Come, Stuart."

"But, Nick! See . . . here, Nick. . . . I'll never get back . . . again. It's lonesome, bein' sick . . . alone, where you can't . . . Nick! You're . . . hurting my wrist!"

He winced from the grasp and on that the last shadow of smile went out of Ben Elliott's face, the slightly apologetic look at interfering in a matter which was not strictly his affair passed from his eyes. He put himself squarely before Brandon.

"Let him go," he said quietly, but his look drove hard into those black eyes.

The man hesitated and flushed.

"If you aren't looking for trouble," he said, voice edged with wrath, "you'll keep out of this!"

"Fair enough. But unless you've got a better reason than I know about, let the old timer alone! Let go his wrist!" he added sharply, as Stuart winced again.

"I'll thank you to keep out of—"

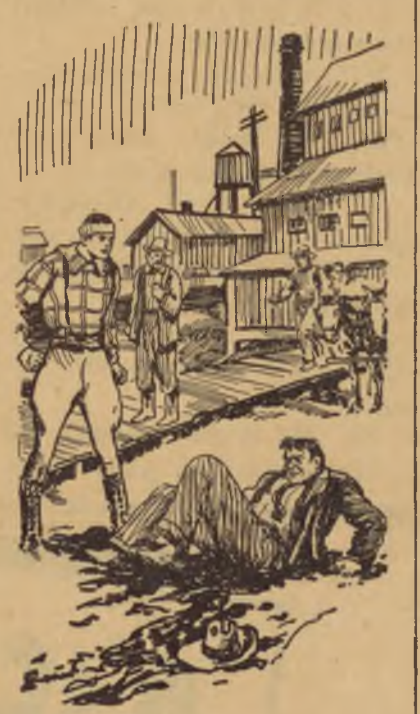
"Let—go—his—wrist, you d—d bully!"

He had grasped Brandon's forearm with both hands, letting his pack slip to the sidewalk. The clutch on Don Stuart's arm loosened. With a snarl Brandon drew back and swung for Ben's jaw. Elliott ducked, swayed forward and bending his supple body caught Brandon about the middle, drove his head into the man's chest, raised a knee to his groin, lifted him from his feet, swung, shoved and flung him free.

With a sharp oath Brandon went down in the half-thawed mire of the street, sprawling ignominiously on his back.

Well, now! This was something else again. Men had been coming, edging cautiously near during the brief argument between Elliott and Nicholas Brandon. But when Brandon, the man who ruled Tincup and its county, was seen lifted from his feet and tossed ignominiously into the mud, trampled by his horses, stirred by the wheels of his wagons and tractors, the street which led through his town, to his mill. . . . Well, then they came a-running!

Bird-Eye cackled an impudent laugh and turned to watch the faces of the vanguard who came to see their liege lord, sprawled in the mud there, scramble to his feet. Their voices were raised in incredulity. In two decades and more no man save Bird-Eye Blaine had dared lift even his voice in Tincup in other than respect for Nicholas Brandon. And now this stranger had picked him up and thrown him away!



With A Sharp Oath Brandon Went Down Into the Half-Thawed Mire of the Street.

But Brandon was up, lurching for the sidewalk where Ben Elliott stood, legs spread, fists clenched but with good humor repossessed and grinning as he had grinned at Bull Duval; grinning as a man will who loves combat for its own sake and not at all as one who fights in red rage.

However his smile faded and his jaw settled as Brandon uplifted his face in that rush. Murder was there, in the black eyes, in the loose hanging of the lower lip, in the purple flush of his cheeks. Murder, and no less. As quickly as that homicidal look had come, it passed. Something like fear swept those eyes, driving it away. Not fear of this encounter, Ben knew; not fear of a stronger, younger man. Something else again; something entirely different. It was the sort of fear that comes from within; the kind of fear a man has for his own impulses.

Brandon halted abruptly. His fists relaxed into hands and with one of them he brushed rather aimlessly at mud on his sleeve.

A dozen men were close, then, holding back, watching, waiting, listening. Others were coming; many more, pounding over the walk, splashing through melting puddles, keyed to grand excitement. And as Brandon halted, looking up into Elliott's face and evidently fighting for self-control, one of these new arrivals pushed to the front and came up importantly.

"What's the matter, Mr. Brandon?" he asked sharply, with the manner of one ready to render service.

Brandon did not reply at once. He settled his coat on his shoulders.

"Sheriff, arrest this young man immediately," he said then. "I'll swear to a complaint of assault and battery myself."

A sigh of relief, of disappointment, of laxing tension, or of all these combined, went up from the growing group. The sheriff turned to Elliott and touched his arm significantly.

"You'd better come along, Elliott," he said. "You took in too much territory."

Ben looked about almost foolishly. He was embarrassed and surprised. He had expected a rough-and-tumble fight in what he considered a righteous cause and surely he was the sort who would have been on familiar ground in such an encounter. But here he was, with a sheriff plucking at his sleeve!

He laughed a bit sheepishly.

"All right, Sheriff. If it's arresting you run to here in Tincup, likely I'm it!"

He turned for his pack-sack and as he did so observed old Don Stuart sitting weakly on the step of the vacant store building before which the scene had been enacted. Perspiration beaded his waxen face and his quick breath came through open, colorless lips. He was obviously a sick man and trouble clouded Elliott's eyes.

"Minute, Sheriff," he said and crossed to Don, thrusting one hand into a pants pocket.

"Here, old timer," he said gently. The hand came out and into Stuart's palm he pressed a thin packet of bills and some change. "Get one of your old buddies . . . Here you!"—straightening and beckoning Bird-Eye, who approached with alacrity. "Get the old timer to a hotel. Better get a doctor, too. He's heeled enough to take care of himself a few days. After that . . . we'll see."

He turned then and fastened a severe gaze on Brandon.

"And you, chum, let him alone!" he warned. "Until a doctor says he can travel, you watch your step with him!"

But Brandon ignored this. He was buttoning his coat, pushing his way through the group, which fell aside respectfully.

"All right, Sheriff," said Ben to that worthy. "Let's go!"

CHAPTER II

Able Armitage, justice of the peace in Tincup, looked over his spectacles into the face of the prisoner before him and a twinkle appeared in his keen blue eyes. He asked:

"Now, young man, you're charged with assault and battery on the person of Nicholas Brandon. Are you guilty?"

From the rear windows of his cluttered little office, Able had watched young Ben Elliott emerge from the status of a complete stranger to the populace to that of its latest hero by sending Mr. Bull Duval to a damp and ignominious finish in the log birling. After that he picked up an old clarinet and commenced to play a halting, aimless and not completely musical tune.

He was so occupied either with the musical performance or with his thoughts that he did not hear the tramp of many feet on the walk outside and was unaware that he was about to be called on to function in an official capacity. When the door opened, though, and Ben Elliott, Hickens, the sheriff, and Nicholas Brandon, followed, it seemed, by the total male population of the county, surged through the doorway the clarinet's squawking leaped into a shrill squeal and died away. The judge's feet dropped to the floor and he swung his chair to face the entrance.

The sheriff stated his errand, the complaint was drawn, Nicholas Brandon affixed his signature and then for the first time Able looked closely into the face of the defendant.

It was a long and searching look and was met steadily by a pair of clear, steel-gray eyes which seemed, on careful inspection, to be struggling to hold back an expression that might, if permitted to develop, have proved to be a mischievous smile.

Origin of English Toy Spaniel Much Disputed

Retrousse nose, abundant coat and highly intelligent expression—those are the chief characteristics of the English Toy Spaniel, observes an authority in the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

There are four classes of English Toy Spaniels—King Charles, Blenheim, Ruby and Prince Charles. King Charles have a black and tan coat, Blenheim have a red and white coat, Ruby a solid red and Prince Charles a tricolor coat.

Under an American Kennel club ruling in 1902, English Toy Spaniels were classed together in a general group. Another standard for the breed was adopted by the Toy Spaniel Club of America in 1909.

The origin of the Toy Spaniel is so much disputed that Pug, Malteset, Pekingese, Jap and even the Bulldog have been credited with a share in its ancestry. A cross probably was used to obtain the present short-faced specimen.

Toy Spaniels date back to the Sixteenth century. They were in high favor before the restoration of the House of Stuart in England.

Since the days of King Charles, whose name they bear, they have been closely associated with royalty. They reached the zenith of their popularity during the reign of James II, who bred them extensively.

Sensitiveness to Sound

Tests of human sensitiveness to sound show that when a paper bag is exploded near a man's ear, the pressure on his brain increases fourfold, while the rhythmic working of his stomach muscles is slowed down by a third.

PATIENT CONVICT SHOWS INGENUITY IN PRISON BREAK

Spends Years in Preparation; Recaptured After Few Hours Freedom.

Jackson, Mich.—Day after day, week after week, and year after year, Stephen Kaleman was serving out a life sentence for murder in the Jackson penitentiary.

He was a skilled workman and was assigned to the arts and crafts department of the grim prison. Outside was the free air; inside was drab monotony.

To win that freedom Kaleman needed tools. Surreptitiously he began to take metals from the workshop; a bit of steel here, a bit of iron there. From them he fashioned crude but efficient drills and files, saws, and a hammer.

Needs a Gun—Makes Him One.

A weapon was needed. Kaleman slipped out of the arts and crafts department a short piece of tubular steel. Night after night he worked on it until it was rifled. Another piece he made into a firing chamber. With a knife he fashioned a wooden stock and assembled the gun by attaching the barrel to the stock with stolen set screws.

Copper tubing formed the shells. Bullets he molded from lead. Matchheads and cellulose, soaked from the back of playing cards and some other highly combustible material became his powder. A solder cap impregnated with fulminate became a detonator.

After months, Kaleman was ready with his first plans. He took one man into his confidence. It was John Schultz, also serving life for murder. Together, they gained entrance to the basement through steel trap doors in the floor, used for drainage. Through a labyrinth of pipes, conduits, and electric cables they made their way to a concrete air shaft which led to the roof. They chiseled their way into the shaft through two sets of steel sheeting and the concrete.

Fits Ladder of Steel.

Up the shaft at two foot intervals there were bolts holding the reinforcement for the concrete. Kaleman carefully fitted their threads to pieces of iron tubing he had stolen. Carefully he worked upward, screwing in the tubes as ladder "rungs" as he progressed at night and removing them each day to avoid discovery.

Forty "rungs" finally were ready. Schultz meanwhile was slipping twine out of the shop and weaving it into a rope.

Then all was ready. They wired the basement door shut, entered the airshaft, and climbed upward, slowly but steadily, Kaleman setting the bars on the way.

Schultz' rope was thrown over the edge of the roof and they slid down, outside the prison walls to freedom!

But an alarm had been sounded. Kaleman was recaptured by two guards who had trailed him eight miles through the snow. Schultz was seized after a few hours freedom in the home of a farmer whose wife had suspected him when he applied for food. She had telephoned the prison while he ate.

Beauty Sleeps 24 Years; Shocked at Lover's Death

Johannesburg, South Africa.—Sleep has robbed Anna Swanepoll of Litchtenburg of more than half her life.

She fell asleep 24 years ago, when she was twenty and beautiful, and is still sleeping.

A great sorrow was the cause.

She was engaged to a young farmer in Lichtenburg, in the western Transvaal. They were very much in love and saw each other daily.

One day, in 1910, while out shooting wild duck, the farmer was accidentally shot dead.

When the news was broken to Anna the shock was so great that she contracted hysterical catalepsy, and fell into a death-like sleep.

After a while she was moved to Johannesburg sanatorium. Doctors could not awaken her.

She looks little more than a living skeleton, but when she fell into her long sleep she was a girl of striking beauty, with long golden hair.

Once in every six months or so she awakens into semi-consciousness, but is never able to say a word.

Man Throws Lamp at Wife; Panic Costs Life

Cincinnati.—One woman leaped to her death and two children were injured, one seriously, when a man became angry at his wife and hurled a lamp at her, igniting a bed. Nine other tenants in the house were rescued from the blazing structure by firemen.

The dead woman was Mrs. Louise O'Neil, thirty-five, negro, who became panic-stricken and leaped from a third-floor window. She died of a skull fracture and internal injuries. Police sought the man they believed threw the lamp.

Silver Dollars in Bell

At the time the bell was fabricated, the pioneer Ramsey family gathered up 100 silver dollars and had them added to the materials to give a "silver tone" to the bell.

BIRD SANCTUARY IN CITY

In the heart of Liverpool, England, eight miles from the open country, there is a remarkable bird sanctuary, which has been constructed in an old cemetery of St. James' cathedral. In this sanctuary can be found thrushes, robins, blackbirds, tom-tits, green-finches, starlings, hedge sparrows and wrens. The sanctuary has its special watcher and keeper, who places over ten pounds of bird food, consisting of chopped bacon-rind, breadcrumbs, peanuts, stale light cakes, etc., on the many bird tables every morning and night. There are bird-baths and drinking fountains, in addition to the nesting boxes and feeding tables. In the center of the sanctuary stands a beautiful granite memorial fountain.

WHEN YOU TAKE A LAXATIVE

. . . use a spoon

It isn't what brand of laxative you take that's so important—it's the form. A liquid laxative can be taken in any required amount. If only a little is needed, you need never take a bit too much.

Doctors favor the easily measured liquid laxatives. Instead of any form that does not encourage variation from the fixed dose. A fixed dose may be an overdose for you—or your child.

Give the bowels only as much help as may be needed, and less help as the need grows less. You will find Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin an excellent aid in regulating the bowels. It contains senna and cascara (natural laxatives) and it will clear-up any bilious, sluggish condition without upset. Delightful taste, and pleasant action. Your druggist has it.

Pimples on Face Never Could Shave

Healed by Cuticura

"Three years ago my face and arms broke out with a skin eruption that was followed by large, red pimples. They festered and went all over my face and arms. They itched and burned and I could never shave. I lost much rest at night with them.

"Nothing I tried helped very much. Then I saw an advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment and purchased them. I used about four cakes of Cuticura Soap and one and a half boxes of Cuticura Ointment and now I feel like a new man. I am completely healed." (Signed) Harry R. REPEAL

During the past few weeks there has been considerable writing concerning the prohibition laws of the State. All orgainzations practically have expressed their views, while the press has not been lagging in editorial policies. Organizations for both sides have been set up, and active campaigns are under way.

It is unwise to make a decision on this question without having given considerable time to weighing the merits of both sides. Having done this it would seem to us, especially in the face of conditions elsewhere, that any change in our present laws toward modification would not only be unwise, but tragic.

The records of those places where modification has taken place, not even to mention those where complete repeal has prevailed, is enough to convince us that, even though prohibition has not been perfect, it is by far the best method of control and protection which has yet been offered to the American public.

Since repeal of the national amendment regarding liquor, the arrests for drunken driving in our nation have increased in an alarming degree.

At the convention of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, held in Washington in October 1934, records revealed that such arrests have increased since repeal 25 per cent in New York, 37 per cent in Massachussetts, 300 per cent in Philadephia, 27 per cent in Trenton, 42 per cent in Washington, and 479 per cent in Los Angeles. To one even of passive interest it would logically appear that if the purpose of the movement is to increase the amount of liquor drunk, to-gether with the amount of people who drink, that repeal is the most effective way it can be done. But, however, if the main purpose is to further temperance and to protect society against drunken individuals staggering the streets and sprawling in places of business, then repeal or modification is the wrong course.

Repeal will not do away with the saloon. "A rose by any other name smells just as sweet". Any place where liquor is sold and consumed will be a saloon, whether it is called a "tavern" or any thing else, and it will have all the attendant evils just as now exists in some of the repeal states. It is interesting to note that four months after trying repeal twenty-one out of twenty-three Chicago suburbs, in a local option election, voted overwhelmingly dry.

Many of the advocates of repeal are urging their measures because of party loyalty, they say. It is to be remembered, however, that perhaps the strongest plank in the democratic platform, surely the one which contained the strongest language, was that which demanded federal aid to effectively asisst dry states to remain dry. This is just as much the democratic platform as national repeal, and should be supported by so called democrats who shout party loyalty, and at the same time completely abrogate one of the most potent of that party's standards.

COACH SUDDETH RESIGNS

Coach Suddeth has resigned as coach of the Montevallo High School and has accepted the position as Athletic Director of the Henderson State Teachers College in Arkansas. Coach Suddeth will leave about February 12.

Everyone was glad to see him get the promotion although they would like very much for him to stay in Montevallo.

Before coming to Montevallo, Mr. Suddeth was coach at Goodwater High School. Also he has been freshman coach at Georgetown College.

MONTEVALLO GETS REVENGE

On February 5th Montevallo defeated Bessemer in the Calera gym. The game was closely fought throughout with the lead changing hands a good many times. Montevallo led at the half by a score of 9 to 8 and in an overtime period won the game 19 to 17, Chas. Findley sinking the winning goal.

This win avenged the former defeat handed Montevallo by Bessemer, at Bessemer a week or two ago. The team seemed to want to give Coach Suddeth, who leaves us next week, a good send off and they did it.

JEMISON DEFEATS MONTEVALLO

The strong Jemison Basket ball team defeated the Montevallo High School Tuesday night 24 to 12.

Montevallo played a good game, although the score was very much in favor of Jemison. Jemison had a much larger and more experienced team than Montevallo. This accounts for part of the defeat.

A return game is to be played at Jemison Saturday night, with revenge in their eyes, the Montevallo boys are going out to defeat Jemison in that game.

A tennis court is being built on the campus of the High School. This is one of the several improvements that is being undertaken this year. The ground has been leveled and sand has been put on it. After this is completed it will be a real nice playground.

Material is being sent to the high school to build a dressing room and also to make a larger basement and boys work shop. This work will start in the near future. The school has long needed a good dressing room for the students who take part in the various activities. Also the work shop has been needed.

The walk from the school building to the street is to be started also. The bricks have been received and work is expected to start soon.

GIRL SCOUT NEWS

During the month of February the Girl Scout program stresses Internationalism, a closer understanding among people.

"The need for this has always existed," says the Girl Scout Leader, but today since distances have shrunk, by means of quicker transportation, speedier ways of communication, cables, fast steamers, airplanes and the like, it has become imperative that better internationalism exist.

It is not only essential to our trade relatives, but also for our continuance of world peace and progress.

In putting on the subject Internationalism the editorial staff of the American Girl, official Girl Scout magazine, last summer, wrote letters to Girl Scouts in foreign countries and as a result, have in the current issue of the magazine, correspondence, from eleven countries, all about activities in scouting and national characteristics.

This one endeavor shows India, Sweden, Ireland, England, France, Chinia, Japan, Finland, New Zealand, Latvia, Canada and United States all engaged in a unity of purpose that will probably result in an intelligent and informed international movement.

Since the youth of nations is demanding its place in the world's affairs,other means of further progress along this line as suggested in scouting are, reading of travel-books using a globe, personal correspondence with children in other lands, collecting stamps dolls and the like, association with the foreign born, of our own country and i ntellectual and cultural development through music, art and the like.

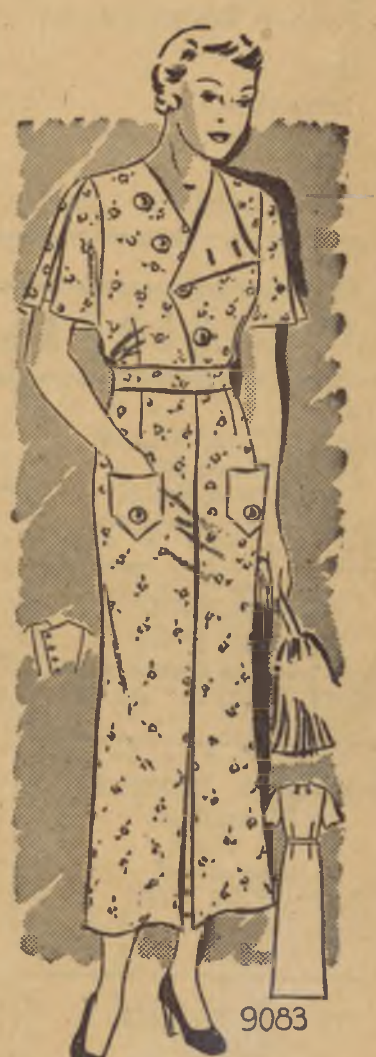
DESIGN HAS ALL THE BEST POINTS OF HOUSE DRESS

PATTERN 9083



Believe it or not, there's a four-point plan of convenience and flattery included in this neatly styled house dress. Let's add them up. First: the bodice may be worn with the contrasting rever, as shown in the larger sketch, or it may button all the way up to a smart point. Second: the sleeves boast little inverted pleats, jaunty to look at and very comfortable when working. Third: the slenderizing line sweeping down the middle front of the frock ends in another inverted pleat to give the slim skirt adequate fullness. And finally, the patch pockets with their important buttons are both useful and chic!

Pattern 9083 may be ordered only in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 requires 4 yards 36 inch fabric and ¾ yard contrasting.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Often When I Was Dragging My Weary Way to Bed, I Would Hear Him as I Passed His Suite, Dictating a Speech.

The Perils of Politics

By JAMES J. MONTAGUE

My service as a member of a campaign squad have been discontinued permanently. One ought to have something in his past to look back upon with gratitude because it is not likely to occur again. Life, after all, is enjoyable, but as far as we can be sure, only while one is living it. I survived once, but should a second opportunity come to me to travel about on the trail of a candidate, I should politely but firmly leave it ungrasped.

In earlier days a man who had been nominated to the high office to which he aspired was carried from town to town in a comfortable railroad train, escorted to his hotel at the head of a parade and later to the hall in which he was to speak. Seated in a comfortable horse-drawn carriage he bowed to left and right and waved his hand at the cheering multitudes ranged along the street to do him honor. He made a speech at noon and a speech at night. Then retired to his hotel, ate a comfortable dinner, and spent an hour or two discussing the situation with his local supporters, after which he went to bed and to sleep.

That pleasant and enjoyable routine disappeared with the coming of the automobile, and with the assistance, by party leaders, of whirlwind campaigns. I have seen whirlwinds in the West and have been awed by them, and wished I was elsewhere. But many days during my service as the supporter of a candidate, I have regarded the days when sections of barns and rural bridges and unhappy cows and calves were spinning through the air as days to which I would gladly return. For pep has been put into politics.

Our candidate did not put it there, perhaps, but he made no effort to remove it. He is one of those people who likes to shake hands, and who had learned how to get in the first grip, so that his fingers will not be wrung from him by his devoted admirers. He has learned to write six or seven speeches while he is driving through the countryside at sixty or seventy miles an hour, and to make the one that seems best suited to the occasion when his local advisors call the parade to a halt. And, after a day that would leave a Bengal tiger limp and panting, he thinks nothing of sitting up till two or three in the morning talking with his retinue about what he ought to do tomorrow.

But it wasn't so much that that troubled me. It was the dash from town to town or from countryside to countryside in which we who followed his car in a huge reeling motor bus had to participate. On some days he was scheduled for six afternoon speeches in towns fifty or more miles apart. After breakfast we, of his following, would clamber into the vast bus, take our seats, get a firm hold on a strap, set our teeth, and dash forth.

Ahead of us was the candidate, listening to advisors who were giving him tips as to what to talk about to the next audience, and paying scant attention to them. Ahead of him were other retainers, talking over suggestions and plans to lay before him, and ahead of them were either two uniformed motorcycle policemen or a flivver containing state policemen.

In ten minutes after the start we were making fifty miles an hour. The sirens on the police cars or cycles shrieked like fire trucks racing through a city, the limousines rocked and swayed, and the motor bus leaped from depression to depression on the road like a giant jack rabbit. Rural motorists, truck drivers, farmers, appalled at the din, drew up beside the road and gazed at us with paling faces as we sped by them. Children raced beside the way shrieking madly. Men and women darted from farm houses and gaped over the fences at us. But on we rushed, unheeding.

Presently there was a signal from the sirens ahead, the brakes ground all along the array of cars, and we came to a stop in front of a school house or a town hall. Out hopped the candidate, into the building he rushed, made a five-minute speech, paused to shake out-stretched hands, then we all went into our equipages and forth we embarked o'er the hard high road. On one occasion we found the audience consisted of children who would have to wait for another ten years before they attained voting age. The candidate was a little taken aback, but he made a short speech, asked them to tell their parents about it, and away we raced again. We learned afterward that by some mistake we had got into the wrong hall, but there was no time to fuss about that.

Soon we began to glimpse church spires and the tops of skyscrapers over the trees and low hills, and knew that a city was near. I sat back with a sigh of gratitude. Here at least the pace must slow. Not even a political caravan could make its way through city streets at sixty miles an hour. I lit a cigar and prepared to take a few minutes of ease.

They were never taken. Outside the city we slowed down, but only to exchange our rural guard for a covey of city mounted policemen, and these gentlemen had motor cycles, not horses. Before I could catch a fresh breath, they set their sirens going continuously, and in their wake we rocked and roared along, around corners, over streets under repair and down narrow lanes, never once slackening our gait. If we came closer to a truck or a street car than the drivers had reckoned on, we merely shifted over a few feet while two wheels hiped up on the sidewalk, scattering startled pedestrains left and right, and proceeded on our way.

How we ever got through, and how a hundred people or so ever had the agility to escape us, is something that will forever remain a secret to me. But we did it, and presently were flowing forth from the bus and swarming into a hotel.

But not to rest. Three minutes after our arrival the candidate was making a speech and shaking hands. Five minutes later he was telling us what would be his plans for the afternoon. In another one minute we were forth and to the harvest field again.

Night brought no respite. There were two, and sometimes three speeches, frantic battles to get into the halls and out again, and often dashes through the night to some suburban hall which the local boys had forgotten for the nonce, but insisted must be visited. And through all and each of those long days, the candidate never turned a hair, never faltered in a speech for an instant, never failed to say something pleasant about the town and the people in it, and never showed a sign of fatigue.

Often when I was dragging my weary way to bed in a hotel after a terrific day, I would hear him as I passed his suite dictating a speech or discussing something with the native political yeomanry. And at seven o'clock in the morning he was out and ready again, his geniality unimpaired and his zest for battle keener than ever.

On the last night that I accompanied the procession we returned to town in a sleeping car which we boarded at midnight. As I passed his stateroom I heard him dictating, "And, as I have said so many times before, there are issues in this campaign which—" Then I went to my berth and tried to get a little sleep.

In the morning I found him packing away a solid breakfast. "Aren't you nearly all in?" I said.

"All in?" he asked. "H—l no. By the way, if you see my secretary, ask him to come in here. I've just thought of something I ought to say to the meeting I'm going to speak to when we get into town."

How Calotabs Help Nature To Throw Off a Bad Cold

Millions have found in Calotabs a most valuable aid in the treatment of colds. They take one or two tablets the first night and repeat the third or fifth night if needed.

How do Calotabs help Nature throw off a cold? First, Calotabs are one of the most thorough and dependable of all intestinal eliminants, thus cleansing the intestinal tract of the germ-laden mucus and toxines. Second, Calotabs are diuretic to the kidneys, promoting the elimination of cold poisons from the blood. Thus Calotabs serve the double purpose of a purgative and diuretic, both of which are needed in the treatment of colds.

Calotabs are quite economical; only twenty-five cents for the family package, ten cents for the trial package. (Adv.)

A special invitation is given to all to attend this service.

THIS AND THAT

W. J. BALDWIN

Little Bibb Graves
Sat on some staves,
Cutting his political pie;
He stuck in his knife,
And cut for dear life
said: "What a hard job have I."

It is reasonable to suspect that those who are anxious to eat the pie they helped bake are not quite so anxious now as they were when the pie was being baked. Governor Graves took the ala mode off the big slice when he trimmed the pay to $300 a month. Too, cutting a pie into 2,000 slices is not calculated to give each eater a very hefty morsel, to say nothing of the thousands who won't get a bite.

Silence is often golden compared with the silver of too many words.

"Beer in mind that lips that touch liquor shall not touch,,—"Bull" Bonner.

God's storehouse was not large enough to hold the bulk of his precious gifts, so he built Alabama.

What's become of the old fashioned girl who used to say "Horrors! I smell whiskey on your breath!"

Darn those Christmas socks!

President Roosevelt recently stood on that sacred spot where Jefferson Davis pledged his all to the Confederacy, and proffered to Alabama the nation's cooperation; Bibb Graves three weeks ago stood on the same spot and pledged Alabama's co-operation to the nation. Both are fulfilling their pledges. In 1936, the people of all the States will ask this pair to carry on as the standard-bearers of America's prosperity. Vice-Preisdent Graves sounds good, dosen't it?

And in order to keep Alabama apace with the times, this column hereby nominates Dr. Henry J. Willingham for Governor, moves that the nominations be closed and that Dr. Willingham be elected by acclamation. All in favor say "aye"; those opposed, "no" The ayes have it and Governor Willingham will please be seated.

If beer and whiskey interfere with your business, cut out the whiskey.

Arthur Heustess built a better mousetrap than his neigh--bor and the world beat a path to his door. When Governor Graves began casting about for a worthy successor to William F. Feagin, head of the State Board of Administration naturally his thoughts turned to a young man who had made good in every capacity entrusted to him. Consequently, he named Mr. Heustess, thereby recogizing ability, loyality and trustworthiness. Too, Governor Graves owed a big debt to South Alabama for a tremendous vote and he wanted to pay the debt with interest, so he picked out the biggest and most responsible appointive job in the capitol and gave it to a Covington County boy. With Hamp Draper, associate member, and Arthur Heustess, the president, guiding the destinies of the board of control, the governor can now forget that department and turn his worries in other directions.

What's become of the old-time boy who used to play tobacco tag? What's become of the tobacco tag?

A pessimist wears smoked glasses.

With Senators Stephens, Bonner, Walton, Carlton, Weaver and Glover housed in the Gay-Teague Hotel, and a host of the lower house members domiciled in the same hostelry to say nothing of the newspaper scribes abiding under the same roof, the political center of Montgomery has moved itself nearer the Alabama river. Senator Bonner swears he had nothing to do with it and that there is no significance attached to the fact that the delegation of law-makers sought quarters close to so much water.

March First Is Bird Day In Alabama

Montgomery, Ala. — Bird Day, originated in this state 28 years years ago, will be officially observed by Alabamians on March 1.

The date for the observance was announced by I. T. Quinn, commissioner of game and fisheries, after a conference with J. A. Keller, state superintendent of education. The commissioner at the same time suggested a program for school and club use.

"Bird Day, since Alabama originated the idea in 1907, has been one of the median by which an ever-growing interest in bird protection and conservation has been brought about," he said.

"The entire program of conservation as it relates to wildlife forms, including birds is very largely a matter of education and an official observance of Bird Day awakens greater interest among boys and girls of school age in wildlife conservation."

Pointing to the fact that betwee n20 and 30 Alabama cities and towns have been designated as bird sanctuaries, Commissioner Quinn said that Bird Day also serves a san inspiration to civic clubs to throw greater barriers of protection around song and insectivorous birds.

"One or more persons may be found in every community who ca ntalk interestingly on bird life," asserted Commissioner Quinn in outlining a Bird Day program. "Wherever

AUTOMOBILE TAXES ARE PROTESTED BY R. R. OFFICIAL

A contention that the main burden of high automobile taxes falls mainly upon the private automobilist rather than upon motor vehicles using public roads for commercial purposes was made in a statement by H. D. Pollard, receiver of the Central of Georgia railway, in a statement published Tuesday.

Mr. Pollard cited statistics from a recent survey of the United States bureau of public roads, to show that the comparison of the billion dollars in taxes paid annually by the automobile industry with about 350 million in railroad taxes is "misleading."

Mr. Pollard cited the fact that gasoline taxes and registration fees make up the bulk of motor vehicle taxes, and said that this survey showed "that motor busses contributed 1.2 per cent of the registration-fee payments and 1.2 per cent of the gasoline taxes' and 'motor trucks and tractor trucks paid 24.2 per cent of the registration-fee and 24.7 per cent of the gasoline taxes.'

"But of the 3,200 trucks paying 24 per cent of the taxes only approximately 4 per cent were common-carrier or contract-haulers competing with the railroads," says Mr. Pollard. The great majority of the other three million trucks were operated by their owners for delivering their goods, and generally stayed within city or county limits. Trucks and busses competing with the railroads paid only approximately 4 per cent of the gasoline tax and registration fees."

BOOKLET IS BEING SPONSORED BY COLLEGE

The Alabama State Department of Education is sponsoring the publication of a booklet entitled "A Cook Book for Nursery Shcools," specially prepared for the teachers of the Alabama Emergency Nursery Schools by Miss Margaret Shaw, of the Alabama College Home Economics Department.

The volume contains material from a series of lectures which she gave during the school of instruction for the Alabama Emergency Nursery School, held on the campus in the fall of 1934. The book may be used as a guide in meeting children's nutritional needs and as a basis for advice to parents in choosing food for the pre-school child.

It considers the following items: nutritional needs for the child of nursery school age, planning balanced luncheons for the nursery schools, desirable policies for the preparation and planning of food for noon-day meals, nursery school purchasing, and receipts and menus prepared for nursery school use.

Montgomery, Ala.—Ray P. Holland of New York, editor of Field an Stream, says that game species, other than waterfowl, are on the increase in the East.

Mr. Holland and his son, Robert, a West Point graduate now connected with National Parks Service, spent the past week hunting quail on the Shedd plantation near Gastonburg in Wilcox county.

The Field and Stream editor is an enthusiastic hunter and travels thousadns of miles each year to enjoy the sport. In his capacity as editor he dictates the policies and superintends the publication of one of the largest and most widely read sportsmen's magazines in the United States.

His observations lead him to believe that most game and and game bird species, with the notable exception of ducks are steadily increasing in his section of the country. He said this is particularly true of deer, pheasants and the Hungarian partridge. Neither the

FORD DELIVERIES ARE ON INCREASE

Dearborn, Mich.—Domestic retail deliveries of Ford V-8 cars and trucks for January totaled 75,678 units, an increase of 110 percent over deliveries for the same month of 1934, it was announced today at the home offices of the Ford Motor Company. This is the highest total for any January in the past five years. It also exceeds deliveries in the combined months of January and February of last year.

Deliveries in January this year were exceeded in only three months in 1934. They were April, May and June, which are usually considered the peak months of the spring selling season.

Retail deliveries of Ford V-8 trucks were higher than for any January since 1925.

The Ford Company recently announced its January world production of V-8 cars and trucks totaled 105,230 units. Domestic production for February has been set to exceed that of January.

Present production of Ford V-8 units is in excess of 5,000 daily.

Pierre Laval

CONTINENTAL chancelleries turned their attention toward a new plan designed to restore Germany to complete equality among European nations and to strengthen the shaky foundations of peace, as conversations ended between Pierre Laval, French foreign minister, and Sir John Simon, British foreign secretary.

Germany will be offered a promise of repeal of the military clauses of the treaty of Versailles in return for re-entering the League of Nations. Such a concession would seem a victory for Hitler's campaign to restore Germany to its place as a sovereign power in Europe.

Another proposal arising from the negotiations greatly aids France's campaign for security. Regional defense pacts to provide the nations participating with reciprocal assistance in repelling an unprovoked air attack are part of the plan. France and Great Britain are willing to enter into such a series of pacts, and suggest that other European nations be invited to join. This signifies that either nation must rush planes to the aid of the other in the event of attack from the air. The pact will undoubtedly be concluded between Great Britain and France, no matter what action the other nations take, although no formal announcement has been made.

Some European diplomats are not at all certain that Germany and Poland can be persuaded to change the unreceptive attitude they have so far manifested toward suggestions for their participation in an "eastern Locarno." Germany may be so strongly rearmed by this time that she will not be concerned whether her armaments are legalized.

This, however, is only speculation. Dispatches from Germany have indicated the reich's willingness to engage in any conversations proposed by the Franco-British formula, but she must first be assured of complete equality of status.

SENATOR BORAH of Idaho, always sternly opposed to action that might lead the United States into foreign entanglements, has surprisingly come forward with a demand that congress investigate the alleged religious persecutions in Mexico and persuade our neighbors to the south to cease them. The excuse for such proposed meddling is that some citizens of the United States may be among the "victims." Through its representatives in Washington the Mexican government calmly denies there is any religious persecution down there, and says all who obey the laws are permitted to worship as they please. If the Borah resolution carries, Mexico may well tell the United States to mind its own business. Representative Fish of New York followed Borah's lead by introducing in the house a resolution calling upon the President to take diplomatic steps toward abatement of what he declares is growing communism in Mexico. He said the communistic trend was directly connected with the alleged religious persecutions, and that entrenchment of communism in Mexico would seriously affect the United States.

THREE million pounds of steel in the form of a huge gate was slowly lowered into place at the Boulder dam, the great Colorado river was placed under control, and there came into being a new lake which will eventually be the largest ever made by man. In two or three years it will extend back 115 miles from the dam. By June 1 next it will contain about 3,000,000 acre feet of water or one-tenth of its capacity. Only one of the diversion tunnels remains open. It is on the Nevada side and through it will be permitted to flow only enough water to meet the needs of irrigation in the Imperial valley of California.

THE much-advertised benefits from Russian recognition have been rather less than satisfactory. Neither the wide expansion of trade which was anticipated, or the satisfactory settlement of debts materialized, and following a conference with Soviet representatives, Secretary Cordell Hull admitted that diplomatic dilly-dallying had come to an end.

Hull issued a curt statement that "certain diplomatic changes" had been ordered in Moscow. The acting naval attache will be withdrawn, the consulate generalship will be abolished, and further reductions will be made in the personnel of the embassy, he stated.

The United States' action means a period of strained relations between the two countries, although not to the point of the United States government's withdrawing recognition. William C. Bullitt will remain as ambassador but there is little doubt that the United States will not proceed with construction of an embassy building, and that arrangements for creating consulates in other parts of Russia will be deferred.

RIOTING broke out in England as a protest against the new dole measure, despite an announcement by Minister of Labor Oliver Stanley that recent reductions in unemployment payments would be restored.

Thousands continued their protest campaign, demanding not only the restoration of relief cuts, but an increase over the scale of relief imposed before the advent of the unemployment assistance board last month.

Violent clashes occurred at Sheffield, where a mob of 10,000 battled with mounted police. At Glasgow during a discussion of the new relief concessions two councillors were thrown out of the council chamber and a band of unemployed men and women were also forcibly ejected.

Wm. Green

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT renewed the automobile code, with two changes designed to stabilize employment; but the American Federation of Labor, growing daily more dissatisfied with the government's policy, denounced the code extension, and President William Green said: "We will not accept it, recognize nor yield to it." The federation's executive council bitterly attacked Donald Richberg, emergency council director, and Dr. Leo Wolman, chairman of the automobile labor board, asserting they are hostile to the American Federation of Labor. Wolman's board not long ago conducted elections in the Detroit area which revealed that less than 10 per cent of the employees were affiliated with the federation, and presumably for this reason Green and his aids were not consulted in the matter of renewal of the code.

The President lost no time in serving notice that labor would not be permitted to dictate administration policies.

Extension of the code was welcomed by the Automobile Manufacturers' association, its officers declaring there would be steadier work in their factories and that winter unemployment would be greatly reduced. The changes in the code call for the introduction of new models during a 60-day period before or after October 1, and pay and a half for overtime work.

Two days later the President again fired back at the federation in reply to the federation executive council's demand that S. Clay Williams, administration board chairman, be removed at least until a cigarette code satisfactory to labor could be approved. Williams had been appointed after careful consideration, the President said, and there was no need for any controversy.

A resolution had been passed by the labor council asking William Green to seek the ouster of Williams as a foe of labor. Before he took the NRA post Williams headed one of the nation's largest tobacco companies.

AFTER less than a month in office Gov. Thomas H. Moodie was ousted by the North Dakota Supreme court. The court held Moodie ineligible on the ground that he had voted, and thereby established residence, in Minnesota in 1930. The constitutional provision requires candidates for governor to have lived in the state five consecutive years before election. His successor, Lieut. Gov. Walter H. Welford, will be the fourth governor in seven months. Last June the State Supreme court ordered the removal of William Langer, who had just been convicted of conspiracy to solicit political contributions from federal relief workers.

During his brief term in office, Moodie was in difficulties with the legislature, the lower house being controlled by the Nonpartisan party which was hostile to Moodie, who was the second Democrat ever to win the office.

WILLIAM MAC CRACKEN, former assistant secretary of commerce for aeronautics, will spend ten days in jail, the Supreme court decreed, thus settling the right of the senate to punish for contempt. MacCracken was sentenced to jail by the senate when he failed to produce data requested by the senate air mail investigating committee. The District of Columbia Supreme court held the senate acted within its power, but the District Court of Appeals sided with MacCracken.

ORGANIZED labor in America now gives its full support to the international labor organization in Geneva. It was officially announced in the Swiss city that President William Green of the American Federation of Labor, will be the American member of the body. Leon Jouhaux, French labor leader, in a speech at Geneva, expressed the joy of labor representatives of all countries at the co-operation of American labor.

ACTING with startling rapidity, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration ousted a group of radical New Dealers, which Secretary of Agriculture Wallace said was "for the good of the service." Jerome N. Frank, Lee Pressman and Frank Shea and Gardner Jackson all tendered their resignations. The final fate of Fred C. Howe, Victor Rotnam and Alger Hiss still remain in doubt.

The bloodless purge of the group, known as favored proteges of Rexford G. Tugwell, was unexpected. Evidently signals were confused, because President Roosevelt in his press conference stated that he was uninformed of any such action, but later in the day, Secretary Wallace said the President was aware of the action before it was announced.

Wallace added, however, that Tugwell, who is in Florida, had not been consulted. It may be remembered that Tugwell's fight for Frank resulted in the discharge of George N. Peek as AAA administrator, and it was felt by some that it was to avoid possible trouble with Tugwell that he was not informed of the plan.

Agricultural Administrator Davis informed newspaper men that the order was necessary to preserve harmony.

"There was mounting difficulty in getting things done," said Administrator Davis. "We believed things would function more smoothly if they were directed by men familiar with farm problems and having a farm background."

Wallace was asked if this statement applied to Tugwell. He hastily replied that Tugwell had an excellent farm background, which may be a distinct surprise to many.

THE first special federal grand jury to be called at Washington since the Teapot Dome oil scandals more than ten years ago, began investigation of the public works scandal involving an alleged conspiracy to use 200 miles of California redwood pipe in a Texas irrigation project that originally called for no pipe at all.

PWA Administrator Harold L. Ickes instituted the grand jury action. The plot centers around the $4,853,000 Willacy county (Texas) water control program to irrigate citrus orchards. Ickes claims the money was promised by PWA on the understanding that the Willacy project would be a gravity system requiring no pipe, and that after the papers were signed by PWA the plans were mysteriously altered to make it a pressure system and to use 200 miles of redwood pipe. According to the evidence to be placed before the jury, PWA officials and engineers, Texas politicians and lumbermen were parties to the conspiracy.

When the Willacy county matter has been sifted, the jury may investigate reported irregularities in other PWA projects, and may also start a new investigation of War department contracts.

James Farley

POSTMASTER GENERAL JAMES FARLEY will either have to resign his job as head of the Post Office department, or give up the chairmanship of the Democratic national committee if Senator Norris, Nebraska, succeeds in putting through a bill he introduced in the senate.

Norris would take the post office from Farley down out of partisan politics. The postmaster general would be appointed for ten years, and the present system whereby congressmen have an important voice in the appointment of postmasters would be abolished. All employees would be selected for "merit and efficiency" only. The chances of ever putting such a measure through congress are more than problematical. While Norris asserts that "congressmen ought to be tickled to death to be rid of the job," it is hardly likely that very many congressmen will be anxious to give up the "task" of handing out such political plums.

The administration moved hastily to introduce a counter bill which would provide that all postmasterships would be brought under civil service, and which would ban political appointments and open most of the jobs only to career employees in the postal service. The measure was introduced by Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney, Democrat, Wyoming, and was said to have the approval of both the President and Farley.

Only civil service employees of the postal system who have served in supervisory capacities or as post office inspectors, postmasters of first-class offices who have had at least four years of actual experience, or executives "of broad experience in private life" would constitute the class from which postmasters would be selected for offices having gross receipts of $1,000,000 or more.

SPEEDY police action was necessary to avert new bloodshed in Paris on the anniversary of the uprising caused by popular indignation over the Stavinsky scandal disclosures. Thousands of arrests were made as Communists sought to arouse the public to a repetition of the riots of a year ago, when 19 were killed in the Place de la Concorde. Police gave the Reds no chance to carry out their intended maneuvers. The most harmless looking individuals were escorted a few blocks and let go with farewell kicks, while those found carrying weapons were rushed into improvised concentration camps. Premier Flandin was hissed and booed by many fire-eating Nationalists as he attended memorial services in Notre Dame cathedral.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted
by William Bruckart

National Press Building — Washington, D. C.

Starts Something

Washington.—Representative Fish, a New York Republican, has renewed his fight against the radicals whom he charges with having bored into positions of responsibility. In so doing, the New York house member has stirred up a veritable avalanche of reviews, surveys and explorations of what is going on of a socialistic nature in the government. Mr. Fish charged on the floor of the house that some of the New Dealers were making cash contributions to the "reds" and proceeded to name them.

The house speech by Mr. Fish in a general way called attention to the various movements going on that can properly be described as radical in every respect. His attack directed the attention of observers here to some phases of administration policies that thus far have excited little comment.

For many months, of course, the activities of the Agricultural Adjustment administration have been subjected to the criticism that they constitute regimentation of the farmers, that is, a general program that holds down good farmers to the level of the haphazard type in the agricultural industry. Likewise there have been attacks on the methods employed by the Reconstruction Finance corporation which dominates the affairs of some four thousand banks as a result of loans to them and is gradually expanding its sphere of influence among other industries to which loans have been made.

The senate committee on munitions, headed by Senator Nye of North Dakota, appears to be headed for a recommendation that all munitions and ship yards be government controlled if not government owned, and only a few days ago the congress enacted a law extending for two years the operations of the Reconstruction Finance corporation so that it may continue the government influence it has wielded heretofore.

On top of these, Mr. Roosevelt has asked the congress to appropriate almost $5,000,000,000 for his use in the general recovery program and has virtually demanded that this fund be made available to him without strings attached. In other words, the President desires to expend this money as he sees fit, whether it meets with congressional approval or not.

We hear also much discussion of administration policies and legislative proposals providing penalties of a serious character as punishment for those who dare to go contrary to the general recovery laws as advanced by the President. These penalties, fines for the most part, are being described in some quarters as a form of Hitler terrorism. The administration stands on the ground that it must have complete dominance if its schemes are to be successful, but the fact remains that it is prepared by virtue of the punishment available for its use to take away vast sums of money from the industry or individual which objects to government methods. There is arising more and more criticism of the extreme punishment employed in the New Deal legislation and unless I miss my guess badly this feature of the New Deal will flare back upon its sponsors in a manner most unwelcome to the brain trusters.

New Arguments

In connection with the President's plan to have congress provide him with the $5,000,000,000 fund to use in his discretion, opposition has arisen with some new arguments. While the President constantly is repeating his assertion that the administrative branches of the government can accomplish more with a free hand than by having the money ear-marked by congress for specific use, critics are charging that the President's proposal means putting the government further into business. For example, the senate appropriations committee uncovered information the other day while considering the $5,000,000,000 bill that indicated the existence of a plant by which the federal government would engage in the distribution and sale of gasoline.

It take no stretch of the imagination to see how this move links with the previous efforts of Secretary Ickes, as oil administrator, to control the whole oil industry. By the distribution and sale of gasoline, the government can enforce regulations by competition which the Supreme court said were unconstitutional. Its control would be exercised through damming up the stocks of gasoline, and oil companies, privately owned, would find themselves at the mercy of government bureaucrats.

There are many other features of the $5,000,000,000 bill against which fire of the opposition has been directed, but it seems safe to say that congress will yield to the Presidential demand and pass the appropriations measure rather near the form desired by the Chief Executive.

With respect to the operation of "reds" in the government as charged by Mr. Fish, Washington long has been deluged with rumors of radical activities. Except for the charges by Dr. William Wirt, the Gary, Ind., school superintendent, Mr. Fish's accusations are the first to place the finger on names. The New Yorker charged on the floor of the house that Robert Marshall, field director for the bureau of Indian affairs and Gardner Jackson, deputy administrative counsel of the consumers division in the Agricultural Adjustment administration, among others had made cash contributions to the veterans rank and file committee. He asserted that these contributions were made "for the purpose of instigating a bonus march of communists on Washington," and it is to be remembered that the great bonus march of three years ago was headed by the veterans rank and file committee.

Mr. Fish described Mr. Marshall as one of the younger members of the brain trust and asserted that "most of the members" of the brain trust are or have been active in the American civil liberties union.

The representative cited among those in the brain trust who, he said were active in the civil liberties union the following: Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell, undersecretary of agriculture; Donald R. Richberg, director of the National Emergency council and the so-called No. 2 man in the administration; Robert Fechner, Director of the Civilian Conservation corps; Prof. Paul H. Douglas, of the National Recovery administration; Dr. Frederic C. Howe consumers counsel of the Agricultural Adjustment administration; Nathan R. Margold, of the Interior department; James M. Landis, a member of the Federal Securities and Exchange commission and a former member of the federal trade commission; and John A. Lapp, described as an impartial Presidential representative in the National Recovery administration.

First Big Setback

After some 12 years of consideration, the senate has refused to approve American membership in the World Court. In rejecting the President's request for ratification of American adherence to that court the upper house of congress gave the administration its first important setback. And it was an important defeat for Mr. Roosevelt because no one can tell now whether the President is going to maintain the firm grip hitherto held on the senate.

Four Presidents—Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, Republicans, and Roosevelt—have requested senate ratification and four Presidents have had the thing tossed back to them after bitter battles. This time, as heretofore, the senate rejected the proposal on the ground that the United States was being led into the back door of the League of Nations and all will remember how stubbornly the senate resisted entry into the League of Nations when Woodrow Wilson was President. The same arguments were used as have been used before, namely, that if the United States adhered to the permanent court of international justice (the formal title of the court) the country would be catapulted into the midst of all of Europe's entanglements, jealousies and diplomatic chicanery.

Senator Borah of Idaho, one of the leading opponents of court entry, concluded his argument in the senate with the assertion that the World Court was a court of war and not of peace.

Proponents of the court have maintained constantly that the United States could accomplish much toward world peace by participating in court adjudication of controversies. Opponents insisted we should let well enough alone and maintain our isolation. Only through that manner, they argued, can the United States avoid loss of its sovereignty through the dictates of the court decision.

Eastman's Plan

Joseph B. Eastman, federal co-ordinator of railroads, has proposed to congress a new plan for control of the whole structure of transportation in this country. With the approval of the President, Mr. Eastman has offered bills for federal regulation of motor busses and trucks, for the reorganization of the Interstate Commerce commission and establishment of a federal co-ordinator of transportation as a permanent office, compensation for dismissed railroad employees displaced through co-ordination of operation, a revision of the bankruptcy act relating to railroads, provision for the commission to prescribe minimum as well as maximum joint rail and water rates, provision for elimination of alleged benefits or prejudice as to ports and gateways and to limit the right to reparation for damage due to violations of the interstate commerce laws.

The co-ordinator's proposals resulted from a comprehensive study of the general problems relating to transportation. It was probably the most extensive report on these questions that congress ever has received. Certainly, there can be no lack of information available for use by congress if it determines to enact railroad legislation at this session. Whether such legislation will get through is yet problematical. The consensus seems to be that there will be regulation of the motor trucks and busses, but how far beyond that the congress will go appears to depend upon the President's ability to gain a rubber stamp on his program.

Now Science Explains Why So Many People Past 40

Feel That They're Slipping Losing Their "Grip" on Things

Many people 'round 40 think they're "growing old." They feel tired a lot . . . "weak." Have headaches, dizziness, stomach upsets.

Well, scientists say the cause of all this, in a great many cases, is simply an acid condition of the stomach. Nothing more.

All you have to do is to neutralize the excess stomach acidity.

When you have one of these acid stomach upsets, take Phillips' Milk of Magnesia after meals and before going to bed. That's all!

Try this. Soon you'll feel like another person! Take either the familiar liquid "PHILLIPS'" or the convenient new Phillips' Milk of Magnesia Tablets.

ALSO IN TABLET FORM: Phillips' Milk of Magnesia Tablets are now on sale at all drug stores everywhere. Each tiny tablet is the equivalent of a teaspoonful of Genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

SYNOPSIS

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the little lumbering town of Tincup accompanied by Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. He signalizes his coming by defeating Bull Duval, "king of the river," and town bully, in a log-birling contest. Nicholas Brandon the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence. He tries to force him to leave town and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Elliott is arrested.

"Are you guilty or not?" Able repeated and Ben Elliott who had stood at ease before him, slouch hat in his great brown hands, now gave his head a grave twist.

"Well, if pitching a man off the sidewalk into the mud is called assault and battery in Tincup, then I'm about a hundred per cent guilty," he said.

A stir in the room followed that and Able frowned, a convincingly judicial frown.

"Guilty, eh?" He cleared his throat at length. "Now how about this disruption of the peace, anyhow?"

The sheriff spoke:

"You see, Able, 'twas this way. Mr.—"

"Now just a minute, Art. This accused has pleaded guilty, as I understand it. I don't see any need of anybody else saying anything. He's thrown himself on the mercy of this court, you might say, and it's regular and proper and according to the spirit of the statute that I question him before passing sentence. Besides," he added, with a twinkle at Brandon, "I'm a little curious."

The sheriff sniffed and subsided. Clearly, there was little friendship between him and the justice.

"Now, Mr . . ." Able glanced at the complaint again. "Mr. Ben Elliott, how come that you go about the country tossing reputable citizens into the mud?"

"Why, he was trying to make a friend of mine do something he didn't want to do. That's all. I butted in, I guess; he got hard and so,"—shrug—"I lost my head for a minute and put him in his place."

"In the mud, you mean."

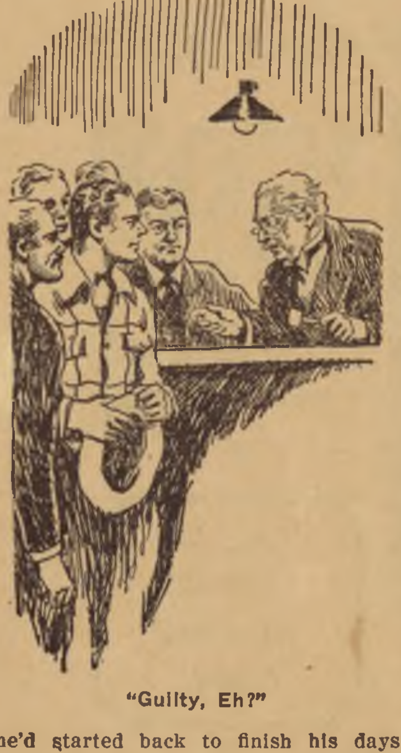
"Yeah. In the mud."

"Well, go on; go on. Go back to the beginning. I want to know all about this affair."

Elliott drew a long breath.

"I started for Tincup several days ago. I was a long ways off, over in Minnesota. This morning I got down to the junction west of here and while I waited for my train got talking to this old timer, Don Stuart, who was in the station. Maybe you know him, Judge. Other folks here do." Able blinked twice; hard. "The old fellow is about all in, I'd say. He's got it into his head that he's about to die and probably his guess isn't such a bad one. Seems this used to be his stamping ground, that he's been away a long time and that he'd started back to finish his days here where he could see some old friends. He went broke on the way and was just sitting there this morning waiting for something to happen. I happened. I wasn't any too well heeled myself, but I had enough for his ticket so I brought him along.

"As luck would have it, I got a chance to pick up a few dollars of Tincup money as soon as we got in and I had to have it, with the old timer on my hands. While I was busy getting this cash this man Brandon evidently saw my buddy and started rushing him back to the depot to take the next train back to where he came from. I didn't like that so well. I tried to talk him out of it but Mr. Brandon isn't a great talker. That's all. . . . Here I am!"



"Guilty, Eh?"

"Guilty as charged, eh?" Able fumbled with the papers. "What brought you such a long ways into Tincup, anyhow?"

"Because I'd heard Tincup was a tough nut to crack."

"Oh. . . . Fond of nuts, are you?" Able asked and the look in his eyes was much less severe. "So you'd heard about Tincup and started for it from a long ways off and . . . Now this matter of nuts: You like all kinds?"

"Not all nuts; no." The steel-gray eyes were a bit narrowed, now, as Elliott tried to plumb the old man's mood.

"Well, for instance: like peanuts?"

"No. Can't stand 'em."

"Not at all? Almonds, then?"

A twinkle was surely coming to life in the court's eyes but, seeing it, the defendant only frowned.

"Can't vote very strong for almonds."

"Or English walnuts or pecans?"

"Never did hold them to be what you'd call irresistible, either."

"Hum-m. . . . How about black walnuts?"

"Now," declared Elliott with a nod, "now, you're getting into real classy nuts!"

Men in the crowd looked at one another, not knowing what to make of this.

"Well, if you like black walnuts, would you say they were your favorite?"

The other considered this question with great, if not wholly genuine, seriousness.

"No, not exactly. I'd put black walnuts high up in the list, all right, your honor, but since you're interested about my preferences in nuts, I'd say that the best nut that ever hung outdoors or offered itself for the cracking was a good old hickory nut."

"Real tough ones, eh?"

"Real tough ones, yes."

Able wiped his face with a palm and wet his lips. The two looked long at one another and that spark passed which will jump from man to man, carried sometimes by a deed, often by a word, frequently by only a glance; that message which says as plainly as though inscribed in black characters against white background: "I like you; I am your friend!" It went from the old man to the young and back again from young to old. Nicholas Brandon understood and the lightnings in his dark eyes played more briskly, more ominously.

"And so you'd figure Tincup as a sort of hickory nut?"

"I had. Tincup has a reputation all through the Lake states. Wherever you go you'll hear it talked about as a hard camp. I'd heard so many times that a good man with ideas of his own, with independence and, maybe, with ambition had better keep away from here that I found myself hankering to get a look at the place."

"What's your line of work?"

"I follow the timber. . . . Anything."

"Well, just what, for instance? What are some of the jobs you've held?"

Elliott smiled a bit.

"Good many. I was a chore boy once; another time I was a road monkey. I've teamed and sawed, worked as millwright and on rivers. Once or twice I've run a camp or two."

"But your avocation, I take it, is looking for hard nuts?"

Brandon spoke now:

"Your honor!" His voice was well modulated and yet in its quality was something which suggested iron covered with velvet. "As complaining witness in this case, may I suggest that we are beginning to waste time? This young man has pleaded guilty. Of course, I do not want to be put in the light of one who attempts to dictate to a court of law, but I have pressing matters to attend to and if we can get on. . ."

Outwardly this was only a suggestion, a plea; really, though, it was one way of demanding, of giving an order.

"Yes, you're a busy man, Nick," Able said and nodded. "I'd sort of figured being busy here today, myself. Sort of wondered if somebody wouldn't bring in Bull Duval on a charge of assault and battery. He trimmed my man Harrington so badly that he's gone and my operation's without a boss today. I sort of thought, being interested as you are in law and order, that Duval might be brought in."

"That is something I know nothing about," Brandon said severely.

"Likely not. You can't be expected to keep as close track of the men who work for you as I do of mine. That is, it isn't reasonable to think a man of your caliber would."

He spoke drily and Elliott, watching the two, could see that his words stung Brandon. The justice straightened in his chair, however.

"But maybe we are delaying things. Now, Mr. Elliott, don't you think it a little out of the way to come into a town, a total stranger, and upset all that town's precedents? If you, instead of one of Mr. Brandon's hired men, had cleaned up on my man Harrington, for instance, it might not have been such a grave offense. But here you come and pick out the one man in Tincup who hasn't been struck or even threatened in longer than I can recall—a man who is regarded here about like most folks would regard a baron of the Middle ages—and toss him out into the mud! Why, Elliott, that's not ever happened before!

"Probably it didn't hurt Nick much, but there are his feelings to consider. Aren't you ashamed of giving people a chance to jeer at Mr. Brandon?"

Elliott looked at Brandon, then, deliberately, carefully, inspected him from his glossy black hair to his muddied breeches.

"It wasn't a very smart thing to do, I guess," he admitted. "It's not likely now, that I'll even get a chance to see how hard a nut this town really is."

"And no worse than you deserve!" Able said sharply. "You know better than to carry on that way, Elliott. I've got to give you a fine commensurate with your offense. I'll fine you a dollar and seventy-five cents for costs or send you to jail for a day."

In the rear a sacrilegious titter or two. From the sheriff, a grunt; from Nicholas Brandon a breath of offended dignity and a look that scorched. But on Ben Elliott's face only appeared a foolish smile.

"That's reasonable enough," he said, "but the joker is this: I haven't even got the dollar!"

"Well, our jail's real comfortable, I'm told. A day there'll let you think over the advisability of going around the country muddying up the pants of respected citizens!"

Elliott, though, faced even so short a jail sentence with anything but relish.

"I can get the money easy enough," he said. "That is if you, your honor, or somebody else'll send a wire for me."

"That might be arranged. Where to?"

"Here—" He reached for a sheet of paper and pencil lying on the table. Swiftly he wrote the words: "Badger Forest Products company, Beech Ridge, Wisconsin." He handed it to Able. "Will you wire them for twenty-five dollars and sign my name? Send the message collect."

"That's a big outfit," the judge said. "You figure they'll do as you ask?"

"Well, they never have turned me down for anything I've asked. Of course, there's always the first time. If you'll do that . . .

"Until that gets back, Sheriff, I suppose it's me for the brig. . . . Is that right, Judge?"

Able was studying the address and when he looked up and grunted an affirmative reply his gaze was far away. Far, far away.

For a considerable interval after his court room had emptied, Able Armitage sat motionless in his chair. His eye still held that far-away look, staring into space, and now and again he picked up the scrap of paper bearing the address young Elliott had written and scanned it closely.

"By cracky!" he said, an hour after being left alone. "By cracky—by jing! It might be, you know. . . . It may be, possibly, perhaps might be!"

Thereupon he rose, went to a wall telephone and put in a call for Nathan Bridger, general manager of the Badger Forest Products company, of Beach Ridge, Wisconsin.

After this he stood for a time in the front window, peering out into the street. A man came along the sidewalk, a man of about Able's years, bearing a limp and rusty bag which stamped him as a physician. He waved a hand to Able and then, as on sudden impulse, changed his course and approached the entry.

"Big day, Able,"—as the justice opened the door.

"Yeah. Big."

"Old Don's back."

"So I heard."

"Bad shape, too."

"I heard that. Real bad, Emory?"

Emory Sweet nodded gravely.

"Heart's like a sponge. He can't last long. . . . Nick was all for sending him back to Hemlock but I told him it would be murder to move him now."

"Oh, Nick showed up, did he?"

"Came right from here. Said he'd been providing for Don for these last years and wanted him with somebody or other in Hemlock who'd see he didn't get hold of hooch again. Was quite provoked when I opposed moving him."

"Nicholas doesn't like the notion of Don's being in this vicinity."

"It's about as popular with him as smallpox. When I'd prevailed on him to let Don alone I told him the truth: that he can't last more than a few weeks and Nick looked like a man who . . . well, like one who's heard good news."

Able nodded. "Safer for Brandon to have him in his grave. But when old Don goes, seems like the last chance of ever clearing the thing up's gone too."

"Looks that way. Unless he'll talk before he dies."

"Even so, it wouldn't amount to much. He's an old bum: he was a known drunkard at the time. It happened so long ago, and with the courts controlled by who they are . . ."

"All but yours."

"And mine without any jurisdiction in sure-enough trouble."

The doctor started out but halted in the doorway.

"Hear Harrington's gone."

"Yes. The Bull ran him out of town."

"Brandon?"

"Don't be simple, Emory. Who else?"

"He certainly can't forget the Hoot Owl, can he? What are you going to do now, Able?"

The other shook his head gravely.

"I wish I could give you an answer . . . or myself an answer. All forenoon I've had a feeling in that palm,"—extending his creased right hand, "as if the end of a rope were slipping through it."

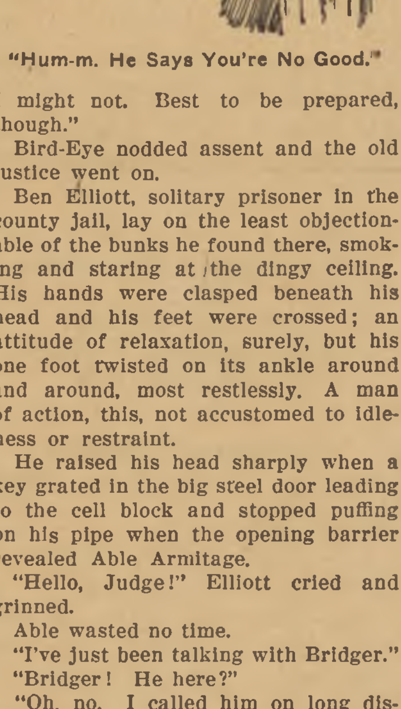
"Tough," muttered the doctor as he went out.

An hour later Able Armitage left his office. He moved with great alacrity for one of his years and stopped only once and that was to draw Bird-Eye Blaine from the throng of onlookers that lined the sidewalk.

"Got your car in town, Bird-Eye?" he asked. "Have? Will it still run?"

"Run!"—as though insulted. "Say, Able, thut car may not be so foxy lookin' as some, but she's got a heart av gold 'nd—"

"All right. Run her around by the jail, will you? Might need you; again, I might not. Best to be prepared, though."



"Hum-m. He Says You're No Good."

Bird-Eye nodded assent and the old justice went on.

Ben Elliott, solitary prisoner in the county jail, lay on the least objectionable of the bunks he found there, smoking and staring at the dingy ceiling. His hands were clasped beneath his head and his feet were crossed; an attitude of relaxation, surely, but his one foot twisted on its ankle around and around, most restlessly. A man of action, this, not accustomed to idleness or restraint.

He raised his head sharply when a key grated in the big steel door leading to the cell block and stopped puffing on his pipe when the opening barrier revealed Able Armitage.

"Hello, Judge!" Elliott cried and grinned.

Able wasted no time.

"I've just been talking with Bridger."

"Bridger! He here?"

"Oh, no. I called him on long distance." Able smiled as the other gave a puzzled frown. "Bridger and I are old friends. We fought Spain together . . . and malaria when we had Spain whipped. I think a lot of Bridger. I've a great respect for him and his opinions."

"So've I. Everybody has."

"Hum-m. He says you're no good."

Elliott started. "Wha-a-at? Why . . . That's funny. Do you mean he wouldn't stake me to the money I asked for?"

Beirut Has Seen Earth's Mighty Men Come and Go

On the face of the rock which overlooks the scenery from Beirut to Tripoli are written the names of every conqueror that has invaded Syria from Sennacherib the Assyrian down to Field Marshal Allenby, who conquered Palestine in the World war.

That mighty testament to Syria's glorious past is one of the few colorful touches to be noted around this seaport at the foot of the Lebanon. The climate is damp and stifling in hot weather. To make life durable, townspeople take to the mountains where cedars such as those Solomon imported for his temple still grow in numbers, although the slopes are no longer forest-covered.

In almost every direction, trips by motor out of Beirut bring one in touch with the immemorial past. Not far down the Mediterranean coast lies Sidon. Oxen now plow the fields where once stood the great temple of Astarte.

Tyre, which the Syrians call Sour, is farther south. Once the mightiest city of the East, it is now a fishermen's village.

Between Beirut and Sidon lies Swaifet, to where Cleopatra is supposed to have journeyed for her final tryst with Anthony before he set out for the battle of Actium.

BRITISH BAKERS CLAIM TO MAKE CRUSTLESS BREAD

Calculations showing that the world's wheat surpluses would disappear, if each individual consumed an extra slice of bread every day, can no longer be accepted as accurate now that London bakers have produced a loaf without any crust. Much of the credit for this accomplishment goes to the geniuses who made possible the transmission of electricity to bakeries and other industrial plants. The new loaf is baked by means of electrical current inside the dough, which, it will readily be seen, is just the reverse of the old process of putting the dough in a hot oven and allowing the heat to penetrate the mass.

It is no less clear that all past estimates dealing with consumption of wheat will need correction when customers all over the world begin to demand crustless bread. For, as the British bakers point out, it will now be possible to make sandwiches without throwing the crust away. This, it is true, has been possible all along, and there are not a few people who prefer and even insist upon having their frankfurters and hamburgers served between slices of bread with the crust intact. But the practice in many home kitchens and quick-service restaurants has been to cut off the crust. Indeed, many employees in these eating places have become expert in severing the crust from the rest of the slice, developing a technique that has elicited the admiration of all patrons. Persons interested in economics, in observing their speed and precision, have also reflected that the need for limitation of wheat acreage would be much greater if the crusts were saved.

The London bakers do not explain in sufficient detail how this marvelous new loaf is made. They do not tell us how the current that passes through the middle of the dough is prevented from forming crust on the inside instead of the outside of the loaf of bread. A loaf whose midsection was hard as a rock would have no advantage over one whose exterior was thickly crusted. But the claim that a crustless loaf of bread is soon to be marketed is of interest not only in London, where an international conference recently assembled to see what could be done to reduce wheat production throughout the world, but in many other countries. For if bread has no crusts to be thrown away, wheat production may have to be further curtailed.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The "liquid test"

. . . it ENDS bowel worries for many people

This is a test that tells you whether the system needs a cathartic change. If you have constant sluggish spells or bilious attacks, and laxatives seem to make things worse, it would be wise to try this:

Stop all use of any laxative that does not encourage variation from a "fixed dose" (which may be entirely too large a dose for your individual need). Use instead, a liquid laxative that you can measure and regulate as to dose. As necessary to repeat, take smaller doses, less and less often, until the bowels are moving without any help at all.

Doctors use liquid laxatives, and a properly prepared liquid laxative, containing natural laxative agents like senna and cascara is a joy and a comfort; a real help in establishing regularity. Ask your doctor about this! (Doctors use liquid laxatives.) You can get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which is a most dependable liquid laxative, at any drug store.

A FRIEND TO THE SOUTH

A birthday which happened this week, one which was scarcely noticed in this section was that of Abraham Lincoln, on February twelth.

There was no better friend to the south in those turbulous days than the president of the Union. It is believed that had not the catastrophe of his assassination overtaken the nation, conditions immediately succeeding the war would have been materially changed. He is held in high esteem by the thinking poeple of the south.

FAIRNESS IS ESSENTIAL

There is one particular trait that is admired in all, whether opponent or ally. That trait is fairness. We believe in broadmindness and breadth of vision, while we know that this is circumscribed by the understanding and comprehension of the person or persons involved.

In the coming referendum on the twenty sixth some of the forces which favor repeal of the state's dry laws are attempting to make it appear that any person who votes NO to the proposals is narrow minded, bigoted, and behind the times. This is a direct violation of the principle which brings the issue to the people for vote. Our nation is founded upon the right of each citizen to exercise his opinion in the ballot, and he is entitled to do this without any deprecating remarks from speakers platforms or the press.

If Alabama citizens prefer to keep liquor in the contraband column, the comments of all the wet press cannot effectively make it appear that Alabama's citizens are backward or narrow. It even appears that the source of these remarks is showing itself to be narrow and prejudiced; not because it favors repeal, but because it does not grant to all the people the right that it assumes for itself: namely the right to think and express the opinions to which logical thinking brings them.

It is hoped, above all things, that the coming election will be marked by fairness. We should actively support the side of the issue which we are convinced is preferable, but at the same time we must grant to those who disagree with us the privilege of so doing.

This paper needs no further explanation of its policy and stand upon this issue. We favor retention of our prohibition laws, but not because of narrow mindness or fanaticism. We believe that from the standpoint of the protection of society, its individuals and institutions, liquor can and will cause more harm when legalized and advertised, than it can possibly cause when illegal to traffic in and possess.

MONTEVALLO TO PLAY JEMISON

The Montevallo High School Basket Ball team will journey to Jemison Saturday to seek revenge for a recent defeat handed them by the strong Jemison team. This will be the first appearance of the team under Coach Hicks this year.

Both teams will be working hard this week as the tournament comes February 22 and 23. Montevallo is planning to enter a team. Having defeated the highly rated Bessemer five, we feel sure our school will be highly represented this year.

Besides this tournament, Fred Allen, Principal of Calera school, is planning to have a tournament for three counties being Shelby, Chilton and Bibb. This should be a real interesting tournament as there are several good teams in these counties. This will be for both the Junior and Senior High School teams.

The New Pain-Relieving, Alkalizing, Effervescent Tablet

Watch it bubble up, then drink it. You will be amazed at the almost instant relief.

It is called Alka-Seltzer because it makes a sparkling alkaline drink, and as it contains an analgesic (Acetyl-Salicylate) it first relieves the pain of everyday ailments and then by restoring the alkaline balance corrects the cause when due to excess acid.

After trying many brands of medicines—so-called relief for gas, and all of them a failure, I gave up hopes. By chance I tried Alka-Seltzer—I am more than satisfied. Geo. Bennett, New York, N. Y.

GIRL SCOUT NEWS

We arrived at Montebriar at about eleven o'clock. After we had unloaded our lunches and other things we went down to the spring and gathered some wood, after we had built a fire and had some red hot coals we covered the potatoes with hot coals and set off to explore. We crossed the creek and explored on the other side of it. Among the trees that we saw were the water oak, canoe birch, holly, sycomore, pine cedar, alder and dogwood. We were very much surprised to find some palmettos..

The wild fern was beautiful growing along the side of springs among the moss. We almost felt like playing we were cave men when we saw so many rocks hanging overhead like caves. Some of the girls went out and sat on a huge rock that extended out into the water. It was quite thrilling to hear the soughling of the pines and the rippling of the water as they combined in perfect harmony. The sound together with the scenery (the warm sun and green trees) made a lovely setting.

After we had finished exploring we went back to the fire and had lunch. We each got a roast potato, and we had brought our own sandwiches. For dersert we had "somemorers," and everyone really did take some more.

After we had finished lunch we started cleaning up. Miss Lee showed us how to make a toaster. As soon as everything was cleaned up we heard Dr. Vaughan blow the horn. We put our things in the car and went down to the creek and looked at the boat, but we did not go riding..

Besides having a good time and learning things we really accomplished something on this trip. Just before leaving four girls passed off fire building..

The Girl Scouts council of Montevallo met in regular session on the morning of February eight. The registration and reregistration of Scouts and Brownies were discussed, plans were made to put on a food sale over a period of the next four weeks, the proceeds of which are to be used in registering and uniforming worthy, needy Girl Scouts.

From Commissioner Vaughns annual report, there are thirty two registered Girl Scouts, and a total of sixty-five registrations including leaders and council members.

Activities for 1934 include the Spring Festival, monthly evening meetings, with all Scouts in games, songs, stargazing, hobbies dramatizations, and shadowgraphs.

Community Service activities were reconditioning toys, dressing dolls, offering gifts for underprivileged, Christmas games, clothing, food, scrapbooks, Thankgiving basket, carrolled at 17 homes, Christmas Eve, especially for shutins.

The log cabin loaned to the Girl Scouts has been used for regular meetings by all troops and for one over night camp by the pioneer group.

Training courses by our Regional Director, Miss Junken and Miss Waites, associate Scout were given.

Money for financing the past year's program came from the Studiosis Club, American Legion Auxiliary, principals funds in High School, and from the Parent-Teachers Association, the sponsoring organizations.

Idle Acres, Idle Men
The Townsend Plan
Mrs. Roosevelt's Enterprise
Another Slave of Man

Ten million idle men and more in the United States. Ten million idle acres and more on either side of this railroad running along the Atlantic coast from southern Florida to New York. Two of the acres, intensively cultivated, would feed a family. Texas alone, under intensive cultivation, could feed the entire population of the earth as it exists now, and oil underneath Texas would run all the automobiles. There is an empire for you, in one single state.

And we talk about "over-population" with so much land not used, and none of it used with full intelligence.

The Townsend plan, $200 a month to everybody sixty years of age, is solemnly discussed by congress, which ought to be passing a sound, reasonable old age pension now. The Townsend plan is an interesting plan in many ways. By taxation on every transaction, on producer, jobber, wholesaler, retailer, manufacturer, buyer, it would practically absorb all available money to turn it over to deserving, or otherwise, persons, aged sixty. It would soon become necessary for some other Townsend to organize a $200-a-month plan for all paupers. There would soon be twice as many paupers as there are people sixty years old.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt is meanly criticized, because, having interested herself in providing better homes for poor people, it appears that the undertaking may involve some slight financial loss, trifling in United States finance.

Mrs. Roosevelt caused families to be moved from miserable hovels into comfortable homes.

A woman with children, living last year in two rooms without windows, with nothing but raw carrots for her Christmas dinner, told Mrs. Roosevelt that she did not dare tell her children it was Christmas day.

On this Christmas day, when Mrs. Roosevelt went to see her, the mother, with a new born baby, and her children, all happy, were living in a decent homestead, with modern improvements, including a cellar full of canned goods.

If that did cost a little money, it was' money well spent.

Other ladies and gentlemen who have spent money for the United States government have not done so well.

A steel gate 12 feet thick, weighing 3,000,000 pounds, was closed one day recently and the Colorado river, its water and power, definitely harnessed, made slaves of man.

The stream that had wandered as it pleased for millions of years, through the magnificent mile-deep canyon of the Colorado, through Boulder Canyon and Black Canyon, was now tied fast in Black Canyon. "The Boulder Dam" is a reality. Hereafter the Colorado will flow as man shall order, lighting cities, irrigating deserts, supplying power far away.

Man eventually will control the earth completely. He has made a good start—at Niagara, Panama, Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam.

Chicago reports the latest "American type" murder. Thomas E. Maloy, veteran head of Chicago's Motion Picture Operators' union, was killed in the usual way, as he sat at the wheel of his automobile.

The government says Mr. Maloy's career as a "union labor leader" was profitable. He had been indicted and released on bail on a charge of failure to report three hundred and fifty thousand dollars' income before the assassin's "slugs" canceled that and other accusations.

If the leader of a motion picture union got that income you wonder how and from whom he got it, also what other motion picture operators who got no such sum think about it.

It was time for somebody to say what Mr. Richberg says now, that he "does not propose to put the interest of the unions above loyalty to his government."

It is a friendly act to remind union labor again that if it wants to know what happens when separate organizations claim the right to run the country they should study conditions in Italy. There are no Italian union leaders collecting millions a year in dues. Former leaders are working with pick and shovel, or tractor, or lathe, according to their mechanical ability.

Kenneth Neu, killer of two men, hanged in New Orleans, entertainer and singer by profession, sang gaily the day before his hanging, sang in the morning before going to the gallows, said he would sing all the way to the scaffold, "Love in Bloom," and "When the Trumpet Sounds." But when he saw the hangman and the noose he stopped singing and only did a feeble tap dance on the scaffold.

pheasant nor the partridge has been propogated successfully in the South.

He recalled approximately 100,000 deer were killed in one year in Pennsylvania and did not seriously deplete the supply. This was two seasons ago when the state opened the season on doe deer in order to thin out the deer population. Ordinarily, he said, between 15,000 and 16,000 bucks are killed a year.

Mr. Holland described the increase of pheasants in some sections of the East as "phenomenal" and asserted that the Hungarian partridge is more plentiful in Saskatchewan and Alberta than the prairie chicken has ever been.

He was immensely pleased with Alabama's report on the increase of wild turkeys. He said all of the states that have copied Alabama's "gobbler law" have shown increases in hteir turkey crops.

Discussing the possibility of a moratorium on duck hunting next year, Mr. Holland expressed fear that, in the event the season is closed, the "good hunters will stay at home and the bad ones will go out and kill the ducks."

VOLUME 2 NUMBER 48 MONTEVALLO, ALABAMA. FRIDAY FEB. 22, 1935. SUBSCRIPTION $1.50 PER YEAR

ANNUAL COLLEGE NIGHT PERFORMANCES TO BEGIN LARGE CROWD EXPECTED

Annual College Night performances will begin this evening in Palmer Hall with the Purples and Golds striving to capture this year's first place. Indications are that it will again be difficult to provide for the crowd.

The 1935 event is the fifteenth annual College Night. Originating as a small dining hall entertainment, the event has grown until it has been necessary to give the program on successive evenings in order to accomodate the crowd. The auditorium is usuall yfilled at the dress rehearsal on the preceding evening while approxibately three thousand are admitted for the regular performance.

Perhaps the intrinsic feature of the program is its originality. The words and music of the songs, the lines of the stunts and impersonations, the scenery and costumes, all are designed and executed entirely by students. A second major attraction of College Night and a factor in its wide appeal is that of participation by every member of the student body. It is truly an all-student production.

Three judges, representing the fields ofmusic, arts and dramatics, will be present at the Friday night program, while two will judge the competition on the closing evening The decision of the five judges be announced at the end of the Saturday performance.

The competition over the years has been remarkably even. The purple swere victors last year, but the past offers no advantage for student may be drawn as a gold and purple in alternate years. This fact prevents a carring over of the rivalry from year to year. But at this time the rivalry tensse—the Golds are out for victory and so are the purples! And late on the evening of February 23 the students, the faculty and a large crowd of visitors will know whether its a Purple or Gold year.

January Is Big Month For Ford

Figures just released by E. D. Bottom, branch manager for the Ford Motor Company here, reveal that January was the biggest month for trucks and commercial cars the com pany has had in the Atlanta branch territory since 1927, which was the real peak year for business in the southeast.

To start the month, a well organized truck drive was inauguarted by Mr. Bottom, with a majority of firms already ready to replace their hauling equipment, and the many new fine features of the new Ford V-8 truck brought an avalanche of orders into the branch, for every type of vehicle used for commercial hauling.

The Ford Company offers their clients 45 different body types to cover any type of hauling they might be called upon to do.

While the truck division was making history, reports from all branches to Mr. Bottom show that passengers car deliveries was 110 per cent increase for January over 1934.

Deliveries in January this year were exceeded in only three months in 1934. They were April, May and June, which are usually considered the peak months of the spring selling season.

Retail deliveries of Ford V-8 trucks were higher than for any January since 1925.

The Ford Company recently announced its January world productions of V-8 cars and trucks totaled 105,230 units. Domestic production for February has been set to exceed that of January.

Graves Has Talk With Dry Leaders

Montgomery, Ala—Governor Bibb Graves last Saturday just before he departed for Washington sandwiched into his busy program a fifteen minute audience with a delegation representing the Alabama Temperance Alliance, in which he assured the drys that the rumor to the effect that he was aiding the wets was false. "I am simply the umpire in a fair game," the chief executive told H. L. Anderton, campaign director of the dry movement, and his colleagues. The Alliance mission left the executive offices at the capitol in a "happy frame of mind."

Gov. Graves in the course of his words to the visiting group, said, "I am adhering to every word of my platform."

In a public statement made by Alliance leaders on coming from the interview they said: "The rumor over the state that the governor was aiding the wets was unfair to him and to the people of Alabama. We know where Gov. Graves stood. We are eminently satisfied to have him assume the position of a referee in the referendum.

LOG CHOPPING CHAMP STAGES CONTEST HERE

Peter McLaren, who claims the wood chopping Championship of America will stage a log cutting contest and demonstration here on Tuesday, Feb. 26, at 9 a. m.

This contest has been arranged by Jeter Mercantile Co., who is to be congratulated for arranging for the visit of this colorful champion, McLaren, whose wizardry with an axe has carried him from a poor farm lad in Australia, to the peak of his profession.

In chopping tours covering a score of years he has chopped before hundreds of thousands, both here and abroad.. McLaren who is nearly 50 years old, claims that outdoor chopping is a great physical developer. His own condition bears out this claim.

The contest is open to any local man who has not previously competed against McLaren. A prize of fifty dollars will be paid to any contestant if McLaren fails to chop through a log in two thirds of the time the contestant takes.

The handicap gives all good choppers a sporting chance to win the prize money, as it is just like giving 33 yards in a hundred yard dash.

The only restriction made is that no contestant be permitted to use a Plumb Axe. This is the only axe which McLaren himself ever uses, and he refuses to chop against a Plumb Axe and also allow the handicap.

Everyone is cordially invited to attend the demonstration. Choppers wishing to compete should bring their axes with them. It costs nothing to enter the contest.

Breach Widens Between Administration and Labor—Hauptmann Sentenced to Death—Inquiries Into Causes of Macon Disaster Get Under Way.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.

S. Clay Williams

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT extended no olive branches toward the American Federation of Labor when he signed the cigarette industry code, which labor leaders had declared was "unsatisfactory." The breach between the administration and labor is daily growing wider.

The code, finally signed after months of argument between the tobacco industry and labor, calls for a forty-hour week and minimum wages from 25 to 40 cents an hour. Labor leaders also objected to the presence of S. Clay Williams, administration board chairman, who they declare is not in sympathy with labor. The President issued a curt statement informing the federation council that Williams' services had been satisfactory and that he had no intention of removing him without cause.

The executive council of the federation, composed of William Green and presidents of the federation of seventeen international unions, states that some present administration labor policies are bringing increased unrest among workers which may reach the danger point of widespread strikes unless corrected.

Thus far, the President seems to have had the best of the argument. Labor leaders, however, are expected to push the fight for a "prevailing wage" clause in work relief legislation, thus endangering the administration program.

INQUIRIES into the causes of the "quiver" which ripped away the two gas cells and caused the giant dirigible "Macon" to plunge into the Pacific has been started. Even the surviving 81 officers and men of the "Sky Queen" are not certain just what caused the catastrophe, although Lieut. Com. H. V. Wiley, survivor of the Akron disaster and master of the Macon, was said to have "some ideas" about it. His findings will be placed before the board of inquiry.

Some hints were made about structural weakness of the $2,450,000 craft, but naval officers refused to discuss the subject. In Washington President Roosevelt said there would be no immediate move to replace the ship.

Survivors of the crash told a dramatic story of heroism. Cruising along at a speed of 63 knots, the ship twice lowered its elevation to avoid rain squalls. A short jar was felt, the ship began to take a bow-up position, and Commander Wiley received a report that one of the 12 helium gas cells was gone. The Macon then rose rapidly to 4,600 feet, its nose sticking up at a sharp angle and then slowly sank toward the ocean as the crew made frantic efforts to right the lurching craft.

As it hit the ocean the crew slid down ropes or dived into the heavy swells. Men swam through flame where flares had ignited oil and gasoline, others rescued companions whose lifebelts were lost or broken in long leaps into the sea. The sailors watched the ship crumble under the waves and at last disappear. Only two men were lost. Cruisers rushed to the scene and picked up the survivors.

BRUNO HAUPTMANN will die in the electric chair at Trenton, N. J., during the week of March 18, unless attorneys secure a stay of execution by filing an appeal. The prisoner showed no trace of emotion as the jurors announced their verdict and did not break under the strain until after Justice Trenchard had pronounced sentence, and he was returned to the cell. There, his iron will gave way and he sobbed as he sat on his hard iron cot.

The jurors required more than 12 hours to reach their verdict. Two of the women were said to have held out for a recommendation of mercy which would have resulted in a life sentence for the man accused of the murder of the Lindbergh baby, but there was no mention of mercy when the verdict was read.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT eked out a close victory in the senate appropriations committee, when the amendment to cut $2,000,000,000 off the administration's $4,880,000,000 work relief bill was defeated by the close vote of 12 to 11. Administration forces scored another victory by the adoption of a compromise amendment to the proposal of Senator Pat McCarran for the payment of prevailing wages on all federal projects. Witnesses testified that McCarran's amendment would have increased the cost of putting 3,500,000 men to work by more than $2,000,000,000 and would have defeated the purpose of the bill.

McCarran did not press his amendment in committee when a substitute was offered, but insists that he will do so on the senate floor. The fight the American Federation of Labor is making on this point is expected to have considerable influence with a number of senators, who fear the wrath of their labor constituents.

The substitute, proposed by Senator Richard B. Russell, and adopted by a vote of 14 to 9, provides that the President shall establish the prevailing rates of pay whenever an investigation discloses that the federal wages of $50 a month are affecting adversely the rates on work of a similar nature. The matter is entirely up to the President, however, and he can take any action or withhold any investigation, just as he sees fit, which may mean much or nothing.

PREMIER MUSSOLINI found Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia is a man not easily frightened. Il Duce's demands for indemnities for Italian colonials killed on the borders of Italian Somaliland were politely, but firmly, refused. The Ethiopians, undismayed by the vast preparations Italy has been making, declared they would fight to their last drop of blood to preserve their independence, that they would not apologize or make reparations for what they maintain is merely defense of their own country. This puts Mussolini in an embarrassing position. He must either send an expeditionary force against the Ethiopians, or back down after mobilizing troops, and that would be a bitter pill for the Italian dictator to swallow.

Chancellor Hitler

CHANCELLOR HITLER emerged from his hermit-like seclusion with a number of counter-proposals which he offered in reply to the Franco-British proposals. Der Fuehrer, a government spokesman stated, would definitely refuse to join any pact guaranteeing Austria's independence unless "the will of the Austrian people is first consulted" by means of a plebiscite to determine whether that nation desires an "anschluss" (union) with the German reich. Hitler will also follow Poland's stand, and will have nothing to do with the French-sponsored eastern securities agreement "if it is to be based on mutual assistance," although he is willing to join an air pact provided it allows Germany an air force equal to Soviet Russia's. Hitler seems particularly anxious to avoid any agreement which would bind Germany to Russia and perhaps result in aiding Russia in event of war between that country and Japan.

From the tone of Hitler's demands, he evidently did not entirely believe that France and Great Britain were not preparing some trap for him. The Hitler reply demands that Germany must be given absolute equality of armaments before anything else can be discussed, and that Germany will negotiate an air pact if her relations with Soviet Russia are considered, and if England, France, Belgium and Italy agree to consult each other before any action is taken. He also insists that the general question of disarmament is allied with the air pact and must be settled at the same time.

When notified that Der Reichfuehrer would make reservations, official British sources indicated that Germany must either accept or reject the agreement in its entirety, and stated partial acceptance would not be agreeable to Great Britain. All of which may be true, or it may be just the old horse-trading spirit which seems to break out in the best diplomatic circles.

DISPATCHES from Bolivia, which must be taken with several grains of salt, indicate that the Bolivians are meeting with success in defending Villa Montes, their last important stronghold in the disputed Gran Chaco, and that the scissors-like offensive of General Estigarribia, Paraguayan commander in chief, is seriously menaced. It was reported the Bolivians, struggling desperately to relieve the pressure on Villa Montes, had defeated the Paraguayans in the Nancorainza sector "after three days of bitter fighting." This offensive, it was thought, might force Estigarribia's northern wing to retreat.

FRANCIS BIDDLE and his national labor relations board took a hand in the controversy between the administration and the American Federation of Labor by offering a suggestion that section 7-A of the recovery act "should be clarified." William Green and his fellow leaders of the federation have long contended that the clause, guaranteeing employees rights to bargain collectively, should be enlarged to specify that the majority of employees should have the right to choose the spokesmen for all employees, and that company unions should be barred. The national labor board, which submitted a report of its first six months' work, defended the majority rule at length. As is well known, the administration desires section 7-A continued unchanged in the new NRA law which is in the process of making.

WITH the full approval of the administration, the army and navy are to receive $40,000,000 to carry out a program of national defense which will consist mainly of improved strongholds on the west coast and in the Pacific. The money, which will be shared equally by the two departments, comes from a $300,000,000 public works fund. Some of the navy's part will be spent along the Atlantic, but the greater part will go for shipyards, dry docks and bases on the Pacific coast, at Pearl harbor, Hawaii, and at Coco Solo, Canal Zone, which is a submarine base.

Nearly $11,000,000 of the army's share is to be used in beginning the construction of a great air base in Hawaii. The total cost of this base is estimated at $18,000,000.

The decision to use most of the money in the Pacific was said to have been influenced by the fact that the fleet has been concentrated in Pacific waters during much of the past two years. Navy officials stressed before the naval committee, that facilities on the coast are inadequate.

Japan is supposed not to be alarmed by this program, congressional leaders having given public and careful assurance that no "offense" is intended and that such propositions as the Hawaii air base would have been put forward even if Japan had not denounced the Washington naval treaty.

At a meeting of the army high command with the military committee of the house these plans for defense were threshed out thoroughly. Gen. Douglas MacArthur, chief of staff, recommended to the committee the purchase of 800 new armored and equipped airplanes at a cost of $90,000,000 to give the army the aerial armada of 2,320 modern aircraft recommended by the Baker aviation committee. These additional aircraft are necessary, MacArthur said in a memorandum, to expand the new general headquarters air force to give it 900 fighting units, for its Pacific, Atlantic and central divisions.

Soon after this meeting the commanders of these three divisions were announced by Brig. Gen. Frank M. Andrews, head of the GHQ air force. Lieut. Col. H. H. Arnold, March field, Calif., was named commander of the first (Pacific) wing with the rank of brigadier general. Lieut. Col. H. O. Pratt, former assistant chief of air corps, was named commander of the second (Atlantic) wing at Langley field, Va., with the rank of brigadier general. Liuet. Col. Gerald C. Brant will command the third (central) wing, Fort Crockett, Texas, with the rank of colonel.

Wright Patman

WHETHER he desires it, President Roosevelt will have to face an early test of his strength against that of bonus payment advocates, if present signs are read correctly. Although bonus leaders have been unable to agree among themselves, they insist the plan be brought up for consideration. Some administration leaders have expressed belief such a step is necessary to prevent a revolt on major administration legislation.

The controversy over possible methods of payment is becoming increasingly bitter. Representative Patman, Texas Democrat, author of a bill to pay the bonus certificates with an issue of new currency, gave out a statement asserting that Commander Frank N. Belgrano of the American Legion wanted to finance payment with a bond issue because the bank of which he is vice president receives $1,350,000 in interest annually on $45,000,000 worth of government bonds.

The American Liberty league also issued a statement applauding the President's stand against paying the bonus. The league said the Legion-backed Vinson bill to finance the bonus through the sale of bonds was "the lesser evil," but asked congress to defeat both it and the Patman measure.

"The President's opposition to immediate payment of the entire face value of the bonus certificates is based on sound principles and deserves to be upheld," the organization added.

NINE old gentlemen of vast dignity, comprising the United States Supreme court, conferred together for five hours Saturday. Then, through Clerk Charles C. Cropley, Chief Justice Hughes announced that there would be no decisions handed down on the following Monday. Nothing was said about the rest of the week, but it was assumed the ruling on the gold clause cases would not be handed down before February 18. It was thought by the well informed that the delay was due to the slowness with which the dissenters were preparing their views.

Meanwhile anxiety over the matter, at least in government circles, was growing less daily. Attorney General Cummings spent two hours with President Roosevelt going over the plans which have been drawn up for immediate action in the event that the decision goes against the government.

ROME and Tokyo were the chief bidders for the 1940 Olympic games, and it now appears that the Japanese capital is likely to be the winner. Count Soyeshima, representative of the Japanese Olympic committee, had an interview with Premier Mussolini in Rome and talked him into a swap by which Japan will use its influence to obtain the 1944 games for Rome. The count said that at first Il Duce was not inclined to agree to the shift but softened under the plea the Olympics would mean much to Japan's celebration of the three thousand sixhundredth anniversary of the founding of the empire.

Home Affairs to the Fore

Washington.—It begins to appear that the Roosevelt administration has returned from its excursion into foreign ports and is now ready to engage in rehabilitation of domestic affairs to the exclusion of international problems, except the matter of reciprocal treaties. It is true that Secretary Hull of the Department of State, Secretary Roper of the Department of Commerce, and Senator Borah, in the senate, have talked about foreign affairs in one way or another, but none of them occasioned any observation or suggestions from the White House by their assertions.

Among the occurrences in the recent period that tend to show how the administration again is putting home affairs to the forefront are the new banking bill, the plans for recovery revival under the five billion dollar public works bill, and the determination of house and senate lately, under a White House spur, to clip the wings of, if not wholly eradicate, the so-called holding companies. Attention might be called also to the uprising in the Department of Agriculture where Secretary Wallace, and Agricultural Adjustment Administrator Chester Davis combined a few days ago to eliminate left-wing members of their respective staffs. They did it summarily, but the end is not yet, either as respects plans of Messrs. Wallace and Davis, or the yelps that may be expected from the radicals who were ousted.

The general information is that, in shelving foreign matters, Mr. Roosevelt has determined to lay aside the St. Lawrence waterway controversy until "pressing domestic matters" are disposed of. Almost in the same breath it can be said that new activity has been disclosed on the part of the New Dealers to spread their doctrine into the states and establish, if possible, uniform laws everywhere concerning privately owned utilities such as electricity and gas. While no one will say so, it is the understanding that considerable pressure is being placed behind the effort to get state legislatures to pass uniform public utilities bills, measures which have been drafted in the Public Works administration here.

New Banking Bill

Probably as important as any legislation that has gone to congress in recent months is the new banking bill. It was transmitted to congress in a most unspectacular manner. There was no out-and-out endorsement by the White House, nor was the sponsoring of the draft made clear. The legislation was dropped into the house hopper the day after Representative Steagall, chairman of the house committee on banking and currency, had given out his own summarization. Chairman Fletcher of the senate committee on banking and currency received the bill the same day as Mr. Steagall and immediately went into a huddle with himself behind closed doors to study the draft. Later he announced with apparent pleasure that it was a great piece of legislation.

Now that the bill has been printed and is available for public inspection, a perfect furore has been aroused. The conservative critics began to squawk immediately that the measure proposes to destroy the Federal Reserve system and concentrate on power of credit and currency expansion or contraction. In the hands of a small group in the Treasury they contend that this amounts to establishment of a central bank and that, under our political system, a central bank would mean an unstable currency. What more could there be then, they ask, to destroy confidence in the currency which we use?

New Dealers, in defense of this new banking legislation, have been given to making wise-cracks about the Old Dealers, who, they assert, desire to see conditions of 1928 and 1929 repeated. They cite, with some justification it seems to me, that central banks exist in most of the major countries of the world and that their service has not been a bad thing at all. Further, the New Dealers argue that the political capital of the United States is in Washington, and the financial capital has been in New York. Why, they ask, should there be such a division?

In between these two schools of thought are sound money advocates and courageous conservatives who take the position that the bill has many good qualities and that it likewise has many provisions definitely to be avoided. You have heard very little expression of opinion from this type because, it is apparent, they are giving the measure close study. They will be heard from later when the legislation is taken up by the respective committees of the house and senate and it is made to appear that some changes surely will result.

* * *

Centralized Control

To summarize the banking legislation—and I think it is of paramount interest to every one because it touches the currency and credit so directly—the real end likely to result from the legislation is a centralized control in Washington of the very nerve center of business, money. The bill proposes to establish what is called an open market committee in Washington and to include as members of this committee three members of the Federal Reserve board. The two remaining members would come from Federal Reserve banks. From this it is seen that the Reserve board becomes the dominant body. It takes no stretch of the imagination to recognize the possibilities. Members of the Reserve board, while they are appointed for a term of ten years, sometimes resign or die off. It immediately becomes possible, therefore, to make the Federal Reserve board a purely political body dominated by the President of the United States.

The function of the open market committee, as proposed in the bill, is to order the purchase or sale of government securities in the open market. If these securities are bought, the Reserve banks issue currency for them and they increase the amount of money in circulation, thereby easing credit. If the banks sell bonds which they have in their portfolios, the currency paid for those bonds obviously is taken out of circulation and that action results in a contraction or reduction of the amount of credit available.

If, for example, the occupant of the White House at any time happens to be an out-and-out inflationist, it is easy to see how government bonds can be absorbed by the Reserve banks and new currency put in circulation in whatever volume the administration policies require.

Another phase of the bill would allow national banks and state banks that are members of the Federal Reserve system to make loans on real estate for a twenty-year term. Five years is the present limitation. One has only to go back for an examination of causes of hundreds of bank failures in recent years to discover that the five-year limitation probably increased the mortality among otherwise sound banks to a greater extent than any other factor. In other words, to grant a bank the privilege of making a loan for twenty years means that such a bank ties up an equal amount of depositor's money in a place from which it cannot be suddenly recalled if the depositors take a sudden notion to withdraw substantial sums from that bank.

* * *

Worthy of Examination

There is another section of the measure which I think is worthy of close Federal Reserve examination. It proposes to combine the jobs of governor and agent, and that the bank policies should be executed by the governor who is selected by the bank board of directors.

This provided something of a dual control, a check and balance on the exercise of power. Now, however, the effort is to be made to combine the jobs and make the head of the bank a strictly government representative.

That course naturally is in line with the Roosevelt program of extending and expanding federal authority. The President has constantly increased the scope of power and influence exercised from Washington. The current offering is accepted everywhere as bringing under federal domination completely the banking system of this nation. It does so because none can deny that the Federal Reserve banks hold a club over the heads of private bankers wherever they may be.

So I believe it is a fair statement to say that Mr. Roosevelt, or those who are responsible to him, is reaching out to amplify the control of credit from Washington which was initiated through the Reconstruction Finance corporation, the Home Owners' Loan corporation, and other leading agencies. The Federal Reserve system was set up, according to the debate on the measure in congress at that time, to decentralize credit control and break the grip which New York exercised over the volume of credit. Now, apparently, it is all coming back to Washington, probably to be exercised by politicians instead of men with banking training.

In connection with the administration's attention to domestic affairs and the consequent legislative changes, attention might well be centered on the meaning of some of the moves. One Washington observer wrote in his newspaper the other day that the administration was renewing its notes at the bank. What he referred to was the extension of life of the Reconstruction Finance corporation and the pumping of more blood into the veins of the Home Owners' Loan corporation.

Something similar has occurred with respect to the Reconstruction Finance corporation which has been given new life and about $350,000,000 in new money by an act of congress.

Then, President Roosevelt has asked for renewal of the life of the National Recovery administration and for re-enactment of the National Industrial Recovery act, both of which expire next June 16.

As a result of these maneuvers a good many observers are of the opinion that the recovery efforts have not been as successful as their optimistic sponsors had predicted a year ago. Renewal of these stop-gap agencies, extension of power here and there, and the initiation of new experiments are given as reasons for the belief that uncertainty exists and satisfactory progress toward recovery is still more apparent than real.

SYNOPSIS

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the little lumbering town of Tincup accompanied by Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. He signalizes his coming by defeating Bull Duval, "king of the river," and town bully, in a log-birling contest. Nicholas Brandon the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence. He tries to force him to leave town and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Elliott is arrested.

"Oh . . . That! I don't know. I didn't ask; I forgot it. I wasn't interested in your fine. We can take care of that. I was interested in finding out about you . . . what kind of a nut-cracker you are"

The young gray eyes were studying the old blue ones closely, now.

"I found out," Able continued. "He says you're no good." In the pause the justice chuckled softly. "He says you're absolutely no good to yourself or anybody else. He tells me that you know more about logging and sawmills than any man your age has a right to know and he's seen a lot of men. He says you can make the worst crew that ever infested a shanty eat out of your hand. He says you don't know what it is to be tired or afraid. . . . And then he says again that you're no use on earth, so far as he can tell!"

Able went on:

"He told me that before the war—your war, not ours—they'd figured you as one of the prize young men in their organization but that since you've come home there's nothing you'll do. You can do anything, he says, but you won't. I asked him why and he said he guessed it was because everything they had to offer you was too simple, which I translated to mean that they haven't a good, tough hickory nut to offer you."

The other's rather embarrassed smile faded.

"Was he . . . mad?" he asked. "Was he really sore at me?"

"Mad like anybody else would be, I take it, if they saw a young man they thought a lot of wasting his time."

"I'm sorry! I think a lot of Mr. Bridger. He certainly has been white with me. I've tried, Judge. Honest, I've tried to give 'em all I had but . . . But he's right. The war upset me, like a lot of others. I haven't got my feet on the ground yet. After the big show everything else seems too d—d easy!"

"Likely. You haven't tried my job yet," Able said gravely.

"Being a justice in Tincup?"

"No. Not that. My real job—my real, tough nut—is being administrator for an estate. The McManus estate, which is nothing more than as pretty a piece of hardwood as ever stood outdoors. The Hoot Owl stuff, we call it. Trying to operate it to a profit and hang on as administrator so some other man won't step in and give that stuff away is my particular hard nut. And it's a chore, Elliott."

He eyed the younger man a brief interval and caught his breath quickly.

"I like the way you looked at Nick Brandon in court this afternoon. No young man has looked at him that way since I can remember. That's why I telephoned Bridger: because I liked the way you looked at Brandon and because I'm about worn-out trying to crack a hard nut. That's why I'm here.

"Maybe, from what Bridger told me, and from what I've seen of you, you might maybe, perhaps, like to take a crack at this nut. . . ."

After a moment he repeated:

"You might, possibly. The fact is, I'm through, Elliott. I've given the job all I had. I'm at my wit's end and the estate's at its rope's end. We're licked, as we stand now, and the truth is that maybe, perhaps, possibly I might do a right fair job of begging you to come and help me!"

Elliott did not speak but watched Able as he fumbled in his pocket for a sketch map. Able paused for a moment, and then continued:

"Come over by the window. Now, here's the lay-out,"—spreading the map on the sill. "Here's the railroad, main line. This is Hoot Owl siding with our mill. Twenty men, there, some living in shanties and the boarding house taking care of the rest. It's a long, narrow strip, you see; seventy-six forties uncut. Four miles of slash to north of the mill. Our railroad goes up through the chopping, so. We've an old coffee-pot of twenty-ton rod engine and freight cars, all more or less ready for junk. Here's the camp now and we're cutting on the second forty north. Got thirty-odd hands there that pass for men.

"Harrington was handling it for me. Man named Buller's millwright and a fellow named Ruppert's boss at camp. Harrington's gone—driven out—and we're in the soup!"

He paused and looked at Elliott, whose keen eyes were studying the detail of the map.

"It's a haywire outfit. The locomotive broke down yesterday and unless the boys get her working, the mill will be out of logs in a week. The mill itself is a grand old ruin but saws, after a fashion. The lumber in the yards is mortgaged up to the last cull piece, there's not enough in the bank to meet interest and pay-roll and there's no boss on the job."

Elliott looked at the old man.

"You said it was as pretty a piece of hardwood as ever stood outdoors. If so, why's it in this jam?"

Able Armitage lifted a hand in gesture and whispered sharply one word:

"Brandon!"

Ben put down the map, replaced the pipe stem between his teeth and shoved his hands deep into pockets.

"Brandon, eh?" He nodded. "Checks out on the stories I'd heard. . . . So Brandon's put you on the toboggan! Why?"

Able shrugged. "Probably because it's kept itself out of his hands for so long. And, besides, there are other reasons.

"Six years ago I was made administrator of this estate and to keep the carrying charges from eating it up, I started to operate. There wasn't a chance to sell the stumpage to anybody but Brandon. Nobody's going to put their money into a devil-ridden county like this! There are too many stories going round of what's happened to others who have tried to work alongside Nick. We had to cut and mill or sell the stumpage to Brandon at his own price. Maybe, if it had been mine, I'd have sold; but the owner of this timber is an orphan girl and . . . a man doesn't like to quit under those circumstances.

"But every man I've put on to run the thing has been beaten, and I've had some good ones there. They can't get decent crews in the first place. Buller, the millwright, Thomas, the camp cook, and a crazy Irishman named Bird-Eye Blaine, who's barn boss, are the only three men you can count on. Brandon spies the good men who come along and if they don't work for him he sees to it that his Bull Duval drives 'em out of the country. And this matter of labor is only one item that he makes hard to supply.

"Until now he hasn't been able to touch me. I've managed to hold out against him politically. But he's watching and the probate court is watching and unless I show some progress by the first of the year I'm going to be booted out as administrator. With another administrator in control he'll buy this timber for a song, a girl will be robbed and the shame of this community will be complete!"

"And what makes you think," Elliott asked, "that I've got a chance to put it over when other men have failed?"

Able did not hesitate:

"Because you have youth and a liking for tough nuts!" He did not smile; his eyes snapped and his voice rose.

"Son"—putting a hand on his shoulder—"I'd take Bridger's word on men quicker than I'd take the word of any man I know. He says you can do it if you will. I'm asking you, now, as an old man with his back to the wall, will you help me on this?"

Ben Elliott did not reply at once. He was staring at the floor as one will when debating with himself and preparing for argument with another. He twisted his head gravely and smiled. Then he looked into Able's face.

"When do we start?" he asked.

The justice swallowed.

"You ready now? Without knowing any more about it?"

"I know enough. It's good timber and it's Brandon who's messing up the detail. . . . Let's go, Judge!"

* * * * * * *

"Who's th' young feller with Able?" the trimmerman asked the filer.

"New boss."

"Him?" The trimmerman spat and leaned further forward for a better look at Ben Elliott as he stood talking to the sawyer in the gloom of early day. "Say . . . Ain't he the lad that ducked th' Bull? 'Nd took a poke at Brandon?"

"Th' same."

"Well I'll be d—d! Only a kid. He may be a good hand on a birlin' log but won't Nick Brandon find him sweet pickin'! He likes 'em young, Nick does . . . and 'specially after this one took such pains to make himself unpopular with Mister Nick!"

"Yup. He'll be duck soup for Brandon all right!"

The hand of the millwright's watch approached the hour. The sawyer pulled the signal cord. The big shaft commenced to turn and from machine to machine went Buller while Able and Ben watched, examining belting, grease cups, seeing that live rollers ran steadily and true. The pulleys turned slowly for a full five minutes and then as the cracked whistle atop the boiler house cackled its message that another working day had begun, the carriage swept forward and the saw snarled its way into a good maple log.

But after that beginning the procedure was not so good. The sawyer was not quick in making decisions. Twice in a half dozen logs his slabs were thick to the point of waste; he did not turn one particularly good piece as soon as he should to grade his lumber to the highest point.

The setter, too, was mediocre. The deck man loafed and let the bull chain fill up and stop even when his deck was half empty.

The mill crew was not happy. They appeared to be men working for a cause they felt was lost.

Ben went with Buller, then, from man to man and watched each do his work.

In the yard they passed logs rolled to one side.

"Much veneer stuff good as that?" Ben asked, eyeing them.

"Not much coming in now, but there's a lot of it standing," Buller answered. "Buyer in here ten days ago looking up bird's-eye maple and veneer birch. Harrington was saving it as it came in; some of it. He had too many things to think about, Harrington did. The buyer's due back any day, though. Market's up, I guess. He'll probably pay a fancy figure for what we have to offer him."

Then he went to the particular problem confronting them. With the locomotive laid up the steady supply of logs from camp to mill would be cut off. Snow was falling lightly, now, but sleighing might be days distant. To log the mill by trucks was impractical, he declared, and unless the railroad equipment could be put in working condition they might be forced to shut down. Fortunately a reserve log supply of a sort was on hand, decked high beside the pond.

"We'll have to break out this one deck now," Buller said.

He whistled and waved to the pond man. Picking up a peavey he led the way toward that high bank of maple, beech and birch logs. Ben followed, watching the foreman as he surveyed the face of the deck and shook his head dubiously.

"Try the big birch first," Buller said to the pond man.

They engaged the hooks of their peaveys; they heaved. The log rolled away easily and lumbered down the incline to the water. Another . . . and still another, each coming away separately and starting no movement of others above them.

Buller spat. "That d—n beech butt's in tight," he said, tapping the log with his peavey pick. "Try her, Jim; now be careful. When she comes, the whole deck'll move in a hurry."

They heaved to no result. With a sharp "Now!" they heaved again, but the beech, nestling in the face of the deck at the height of a man's hip, refused to budge.

"Hold on! Give you a hand." Ben picked up a peavey and approached.

"Here, take this end, Elliott," the foreman said, moving in toward the center which was under the towering facade of the deck.

Buller made no reply but grinned. The pond man looked at Ben approvingly and spat on his hands. Peavey hooks bit the log's ends again; a peavey point, with all Ben Elliott's strength bearing on it, pried beneath the center of the reluctant beech. . . . "Now. . . . Together!"

He lifted his weight from the ground. His peavey handle bent.

"Look out!" Buller's voice was shrill on the warning as movement sent Ben Elliott swinging to the right. The key stick popped out, all but upon Ben. The logs above settled with a heavy mutter and then with that thunderous, ringing, booming sound of hardwood in motion, they rolled upon him.

Elliott had dropped his peavey, leaped nimbly over the beech as it struck the ground and bounced on its way to the water. He hopped to the first log and spurned it with his one foot, landed on the following with both, hesitated a split instant and stepped to yet another. Arms spread, balancing carefully, watching those logs as a boxer watches his opponent's blows, he went up that zooming, booming avalanche as it came down. He danced to the left as the end of one stick swung out to clout him to a pulp. He ran rapidly over three that lumbered down beneath him and paused.

Two came riding together, one atop the other, a moving barrier as high as his waist. Buller opened his lips in a cry of warning but thrusting out one hand, touching the topmost of the pair ever so lightly, Ben vaulted over, landing on another that rolled and grumbled behind the two. Crevasses between logs opened and closed before him. Sticks popped out of the tremendous pressure and rolled down slantwise, imperiling him. He did not run rapidly. At times he seemed to move with painful, with dangerous deliberation. But he was watching the logs and his chances and did not make a move until he was certain of where he was going.

Slowly the deck settled. Half of what had been piled logs now bobbed and swayed and rolled in the pond. The rest, reduced from the height to which it had towered a few seconds before, came to rest. And Ben Elliott, on its lowered crest, stood still a moment until certain the movement was ended and then came slowly down, looking not at the men who gaped at him but at the logs over which he walked with a critical, appraising eye.

"Atta boy!" an unidentified voice yelled above the roar of the carriage exhaust, but if Elliott heard this he gave no indication.

"Now, if Buller can't get that locomotive going by noon," he said to the pale and visibly shaken Able, "we'll telegraph for a new spider. No use taking more chances. Come on, Buller, let's look at the stuff you've got piled."

Blinking, the millwright followed him.

"'Y G—d!" muttered the pond man. "Slick shod, he went over that face! Slick shod! 'Y G—d!"

An hour later the mill stood silent for five minutes while a broken conveyor chain was repaired. In that interval every man on the job had heard the story.

"'Y G—d! Slick shod!" the pond man said again and again. "Cool? Like a watermelon on ice!"

When they started the head sawyer was grinning and it seemed as though the saw stayed in the log more constantly than it had before, as if the mill functioned with greater smoothness, as if something in the nature of enthusiasm went into the labor along with brawn and experience.

CHAPTER III

Not so in the camp where men and horses toiled to make decks of logs by night out of what at dawn had been standing trees. Nearly half the crew were Finns, stolid, uncommunicative fellows, good enough workmen but difficult to speed up.

"Aren't there any good men left loose around here?" Ben asked Able on his first trip to town.

"Old Tim Jeffers is the only man who's stood out against Nick and he's the best logger these woods have ever seen but he doesn't like Brandon, can't work for him and is so disgusted that he's quit the timber and settled down on a farm. He hasn't set foot in a camp for three years and swears he never will again. Neither will he be run out of the country.

"That's part of the hard shell of this nut, Ben: lack of good men who've got the sand to stick here and work for anybody but Brandon."

The next morning—Sunday—Ben sat over a table in his tiny office working with paper and pencil when Bird-Eye Blaine burst in.

"The Bull's here!" the little Irishman exclaimed in a whisper, closing the door behind him hastily. "Th' Bull's here . . . 'nd wearin' his river boots!"

"Th' Bull!" Bird-Eye repeated and swallowed. "He's come, loike he's come to other camps. He'll have eviry domned Finlander 'nd Injun hitting th' road to escape him!"

Ben shoved back his chair then. "What's this?"

"Ah, it's Brandon thut's sint him! He's Misther Brandon's pet bull 'nd he'll clane this camp av men loike he's done many a time before! He's wearin' river boots 'nd swillin' whisky!"

"Where?" Elliott got to his feet.

"In th' men's camp,"—gesticulating with his thumb. "He's just now come in 'nd they're commencin' to sift out, th' domned yellow bellies!"

Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, Involving Panama Canal

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 was signed long before there was a Panama canal in existence and did not give England free use of the Panama canal, notes a writer in the Detroit News. It replaced the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 as an Anglo-American agreement of policy concerning an isthmian canal, then supposed to be fixed as across Nicaragua. Public feeling for some years had been growing sore over the Clayton-Bulwer treaty's restriction on the independent action of the United States, and there was grave fear lest congress might abrogate that treaty by open violence, a great blow to future amicable action.

President McKinley in his annual message for 1898 declared that the canal had become a national necessity. Negotiations were opened with Great Britain and a draft treaty was sent by the President to the senate in February, 1900, providing for the construction of a canal, to be permanently neutralized. Disputes in the senate over the terms led to the formulation of a new treaty, ratified as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in December, 1901.

Before the opening of the Panama canal in 1914 there was a controversy with Great Britain regarding the provision of the Panama Canal act of 1912, exempting American vessels engaged in coastwide trade from canal tolls. This was regarded by the British as a violation of the original treaty. Eventually, after President Wilson had sent congress a message urging this action, this exemption of American ships from the canal tolls was repealed.

Quakers in World War

The Friends, or Quakers, did not actively participate in hostilities during the World war, but rendered invaluable service in relieving distress, providing food, clothing and hospital upplies. After the war the Society of Friends maintained for some years relief agencies, particularly for the starving children of Russia and Germany.

Mussolini Warlike
Supreme Court Power
All Happy There
Learning How to Spend

Arthur Brisbane

Mussolini has found the opportunity to show the world what it means when modern "Rome" starts moving.

He has mobilized an army with air planes to supplement tanks and artillery, and the Emperor of Abyssinia, Haile Selassie, must discipline his unruly chiefs that have offended Mussolini by an attack on African colonies, or so much the worse for Ethiopian Selassie, who believes that he is the direct descendant of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.

Maybe he is, but he will encounter a problem that King Solomon's wisdom could not solve for him when he meets Mussolini's airplanes.

If wise, Selassie will pay the indemnity that Mussolini demands. As a practical business man, Mussolini always asks a little soothing cash. He got some from Greece. Also, Selassie must salute the Italian flag, which costs nothing. Mexico would not do that.

One question may surprise you concerning Supreme court decisions setting aside laws passed by the congress and signed by the President, on the ground that congress, in passing the law, had exceeded its constitutional authority. This is the question: Are those Supreme court decisions in themselves unconstitutional?

When the Supreme court, sometimes by a narrow margin of five to four, declares a law unconstitutional and void, is it exceeding its constitutional authority?

Where in the Constitution of the United States do you find authority for the Supreme court power to overrule congress and the President in the making of laws? This absence of authority is no accident. Those that wrote the Constitution, after long arguing, disputing and many concessions, knew, presumably, what they wanted the Constitution to say. And they did not want it to give the Supreme court the power to veto laws, that it now assumes and exercises.

In London, John Puckering, fifty-eight, apparently dead, was revived after five minutes. Meanwhile, he had gone to heaven. He saw interesting things, came back to tell of them. Souls, evidently, travel more rapidly than light, which takes 900,000,000 years to get outside of the universe as we know it, going 186,000 miles a second. Mr. Pickering says heaven is filled with a "happy crowd."

There were no children. "All were dressed as on earth."

No moths in heaven, of course; no depression either.

Mayor LaGuardia, consulting with President Roosevelt about loans for New York city improvements, again proves that we have at last learned to spend money. Something over $1,100,000,000 would be the preliminary total, for tunnels, highways, public schools, a $150,000,000 housing program, $232,000,000 to bring a better water supply from the Delaware, extension of Park avenue as a broad highway above the tracks of the New York Central north to the Bronx, elimination of slums and the slum character from the East river shores.

From Ireland comes Jack Doyle, via Mayfair, London, 6 feet 4, handsome face, nice smile, big muscles, telling the truth about himself, whatever the damage to his modesty: "I am not like the usual lowbrow fighter. I'll go up and up and up to the very top."

Mr. Doyle sings "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling" very sweetly. Mr. Max Baer, at present prize-fight champion, cannot sing well, but he, too, has self-confidence: "Jack Doyle's prophecies are all very well. He may go 'up and up and up,' but sooner or later on the road up he will meet me, and then he will go down and down and down."

Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., head of General Motors, announces that 30,000 employees, under the company's saving and investment plan, will have $11,000,000 cash divided among them. The employee who saves $25 a month, the maximum, $300 a year, gets back his $300, plus $321.52, contributed by the company, including $114 for interest. It is rather difficult to persuade men to "arise, ye prisoners of starvation," and "throw off their chains," when one of the chains is attached to an "$11,000,000 melon.

Germany plans an army of 400,000 men, small compared with the kaiser's army. But the real fighting machine hereafter will be located in the air, and, besides, German recruits for the 400,000 army will serve only one year, instead of four, giving a rapid turnover of trained fighters. At the end of five years Germany would have 2,000,000 men trained to fight. It is likely, however, that whatever is going to happen will happen long before five years are up.

FOR THE PROTECTION OF SOCIETY

As the date for the prohibition refrendum approaches, this paper will not take space to go into great detail on the issue. We have expressed our opinions, honest ones in our columns before, not in any dictatorial sense, but simply as the expression of our sincere views.

Towards those with whom we differ, we are not bitter. We simply see situations in a different light, and have different methods for their cure.

But for our parting words, two things loom as important. The first is this: if the government has failed in enforcing the prohibition laws, and if it is impossible for these laws to be enforced as the wets maintain, how can any one think that they can regulate and control liquor if it is legalized?

It appears that the wets have talked themselves into a circle. It appears obvious that some interests do not want liquor controlled, but freed, with no restrictions, for equally obvious reasons.

The second important thing is the matter of temperance. The wet leaders claim that they are interested in temperance, and have used a peculiar type of logic which says that the more liquor that is made, advertised, and placed on sale, the less liquor will be consumed. We fail to follow this type of reasoning.

We simply believe that for the protection of society, the welfare of the race, intoxicating beverages can, and should be prohibited.

LETTER TELLS OF REPEAL CONDITIONS IN VIRGINIA

A letter from J. M. Rowland, editor, Richmond Christian Advocate, to Rev. Paul Gilbreath, showing the unbearable debauchery repeal has brought to Virginia.

...We have over four thousand legal liquor shops in the State far more than we had in tht old days of the old fashioned saloon. And in spite of our high powered "Control" Board with its expensive machinery and political officers drawing big salaries everybody admits the bootleggar is flourishing more than ever.

"The courts have just exposed the worst liquor scandal in our history and over forty high citizens and political office holders have been arrested for conspiracy to defraud the Liquor Laws. All the county officers and others seem to be involved and were running a big racket with all of them getting boodle out of it.

"Several of the judges have become alarmed over the marked increase in drunken-driving and wrecks caused therefrom an are lecturing the court and people. The newspapers are conducting safety campaigns for safety in driving. The increase is admitted to be over twenty percent in fatal accidents the first year.

"In social society the matter is so serious with increased drinking among young people that a movement has been started in the society circles to open "Milk Bars" at the parties and try to wean the drinkers from the liquor bottle to the milk bottle.

"In seven local option elections we have had since Repeal six of the towns have voted dry by big majorities.

"I travel about twenty-five thousand miles a year and last year saw more evidence of public drinking than in ten years before. I see empty bottles in the parks and along the streets and roadways and I never saw one in months before. The State Capitol Park we have to go through several times a day is a rendevcus for them when the weather permits. The young lady in the office said the other day she had gotten afraid to go through it on account of menacing bums who drink and then sober up and then start out begging.

"Two of the elite clubs raided last week and lots of liquor confiscated. Both running bootlegging on a big scale.

"I have challenged the two papers in this city to deny they are receiving at least seventy-five thousand dollars a year for liquor ads and they will not answer.. They run as high as three hunred inches daily.

"Notwithstanding the Control Board promised not to advertise, extensive advertising is one on radio, bill boards, and in newspapers and magazines. They wiggle out of it because they say they are not advertising, but all the ads read 'For sale at all the State Liquor Stores."

"We are being run over ruthlessly, have been sold out soul and body by our State policicians and I have lost the last lingering tinge of respect for them.

"I consider conditions here far worse than in the old days and I was here in this town then and know. I had rather have the old dirty stinking dis reputable joints we used to have so we could warn our boys and girls against them than to have these socially prominent places where we have barmaids waiting on customers and Church officials running the business. It is getting tangled up in the churches in a way that spells ruin to our spirtiual progress if we don't do something about it and many preachers are puzzled and speechless and many laymen and women have given up.

"Tell the people of Alabama not to be blinded and mislead by the biggest lying propaganda ever enacted on a civilized people and use this in any way you see fit. I take full responsibility for every line of it. . ."

The above letter proves the following statement of Joseph H. Choate, Jr., the leading wet of the nation and director of the Federal Alchohol Control Administration, in which condems the state control sys-

All these improvements will add greatly to our school.

POWER ORDER ON RATE REDUCTION ISSUED IN STATE

'Objective' Toll To Be Open To All When 85 Per Cent Mark Is Reached

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Feb. 11.—(AP)—The Alabama Public Service Commission today issue an order to the Alabama Power Company directing that when 85 per cent of its customers were billed in any one month after August on the low "objective rate," all customers would be entitled to come under the rate.

In addition, the commission ordered that five per cent reductions were to be made in the objective rate base every six months, instead of every year as under its order of October, 1933, when the objective rate was put into operation. The first new reduction was ordered April 1.

The order affects only customers of the Alabama Power Company.

$600,000 Savings

In establishing the objective, the commission estimated it would result in a $600,000 per year saving when it became fully effective on all residential customers.

"Today's order moves that full saving date up three months at least," said Hugh White, Commission president. "If 85 per cent go on in any month after August it will be effective immediately."

"But for thirteen years (ah, unlucky me!) I've been on the downward path, and it seems that the lower I get, the more some folks kick me around, despite the fact that I'm the cheapest thing they buy . . . and that I'm the only thing that isn't on a higher price sky rocket and that I've done much to make Alabama the foremost industrial State in the South.

"However, while I may be down I'm not downcast, because life for me has a bright side too . . . many of the customers of my Company know how cheap I am and know too that the more work I do, the cheaper I work for them. And that being so unusual in these days of skyrocketing prices, they

THE MISERABLE FAILURE OF REPEAL

WHEN FIGURES ARE PUBLISHED THEY SHOW ONLY ONE THING—THE FAILURE OF REPEAL, NOT THE FAILURE OF PROHIBITION.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS, A WET NEWSPAPER, SAYS:

"NONE OF THE PROMISES HAVE BEEN FULFILLED. THE SALOON IS BACK, LIQUOR IS IN POLITICS, BOOTLEGGING CONTINUES, DRINKING HAS INCREASED, UNEMPLOYMENT IS WORSE, THE REVENUE RETURNS TO THE STATE TREASURY ARE FAR BELOW THE HOPEFUL ESTIMATES OF 1933, AND THE COST OF LIGHTING THE ILLICIT TRAFFIC IS STILL BURDENSOME. FROM OTHER STATES THAN ILLINOIS SIMILAR CONDITIONS ARE REPORTED."

FOUR MONTHS AFTER TRYING REPEAL 21 OUT OF 23 CHICAGO SUBURBS, IN A LOCAL OPTION ELECTION OVERWHELMINGLY DRY.

BUT THE WETS POINT TO CANADA FOR AN IDEAL LIQUOR CONTROL SYSTEM. THE CANADIAN SYSTEM IS A COMPLETE FAILURE

THE DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS REPORTS FOR CANADA UNDER LEGALIZED LIQUORS: DEATHS FROM ALCOHOLISM, INCREASED 113 PER CENT; GENERAL CRIME, INCREASED 109 PER CENT; DRUNKENNESS, INCREASED 55 PER CENT; IMMORAL CRIMES (ONTARIO), INCREASED 76 PER CENT; AUTO WRECKS (DEATHS), INCREASED 42 PER CENT.

SENATOR WALSH (DEMOCRAT), OUTSTANDING WET LEADER, SAID, ON MAY 2, 1934: "AS ONE WHO URGED REPEAL I HAVE BEEN DISAPPOINTED."

ACCORDING TO THE REPORT OF THE CONGRESSIONAL APPROPRIATIONS, IT IS NOW COSTING $632,000 MORE PER YEAR TO FIGHT BOOTLEGGERS THAN THE AVERAGE COST PER YEAR TO ENFORCE THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT.

JOSEPH TRAINER, CHAIRMAN OF THE NATIONAL CODE AUTHORITY, SAID ON NOVEMBER 26, 1934: "BOOTLEGGERS ARE STILLING 50 PER CENT OF THE ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES CONSUMED IN THIS COUNTRY TODAY."

Beer Is Dangerous

DR. BUNGE, THE CELEBRATED GERMAN PHARMACOLOGIST, SAID:

"I MUST EMPHASIZE IN THIS CONNECTION THAT BEER IS THE MOST INJURIOUS OF THE ALCOHOLIC DRINKS, BECAUSE NO OTHER IS MISUSED IN SUCH GREAT QUANTITY, IN ORDER TO BENUMB BOREDOM.... BEER IS THE WORST OF ALL THE ALCOHOLIC DRINKS BECAUSE IT IS THE MOST SEDUCIVE.... IN NO OTHER DRINK DO WE SEE THE HABIT SO SOON FORMED AS WITH BEER.... NO OTHER DRINK LEADS TO SUCH INTEMPERANCE."

A POLICE CARD IS FURNISHED WITH EACH DRIVER'S LICENSE IN BERLIN WHICH SAYS:

"THE SMALLEST QUANTITIES OF ALCOHOL ARE INJURIOUS TO THE MOTOR DRIVER."

ON THIS CARD BEER IS LISTED AS AN INJURIOUS BEVERAGE.

Revenue Is Misleading

THE HIGHEST WET ESTIMATES OF REVENUE WOULD RUN THE SCHOOLS OF ALABAMA TWO WEEKS.

FOR EVERY DOLLAR THE STATE RECEIVED IN TAXES $12.00 WOULD GO TO THE BREWERS AND DISTILLERS. POOR ECONOMICS.

THE CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER SAID JANUARY 22, 1934: "ENROLLMENT AT INSTITUTES FOR ALCOHOLIC DISEASES SINCE REPEAL HAS BROKEN ALL RECORDS.

THE BOSTON HERALD, WHICH IS A WET NEWSPAPER, MAKES THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT:

"THE BOOTLEGGER, WHO WAS TO HAVE BEEN INTERRED FOREVER WHEN THE GHOST OF JOHN BARLEYCORN ESCAPED THE GRAVE AND WALKED AMONG MEN ONCE AGAIN, IS MORE PROSPEROUS THAN EVER HE WAS DURING THE 14 YEARS OF PROHIBITION."

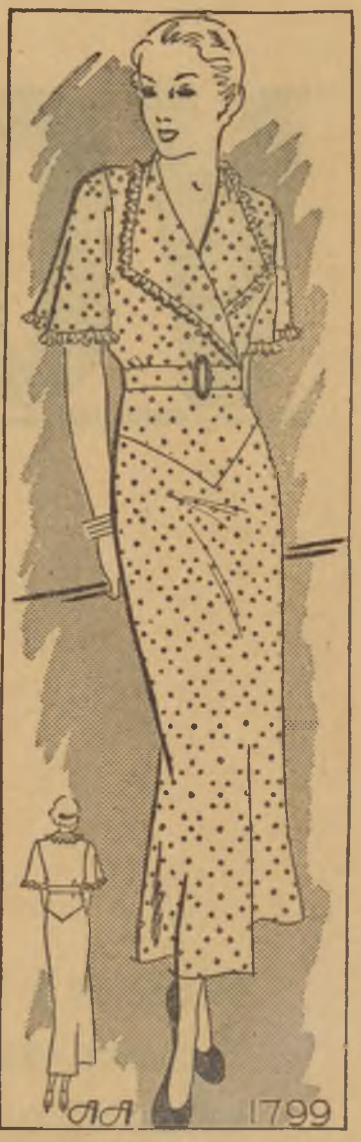
Design Wearer Can Depend On

PATTERN 1799



Anything you do with this design is smart, and you can do many things with it. Don't you like it as it is, made of a crisp, fresh little cotton? Now think of it in navy blue dotted voile with pleated net frills. Could anything be more charming? A surplice front is always one of the most becoming things a woman can wear, and the big revers make this one doubly flattering. The sleeves are as graceful as can be, and the well-proportioned points at the front and the back of the skirt do the most astonishing things for the figure when it is a bit large.

Pattern 1799 is available in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 takes 4¼ yards 36-inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth Street, New York.

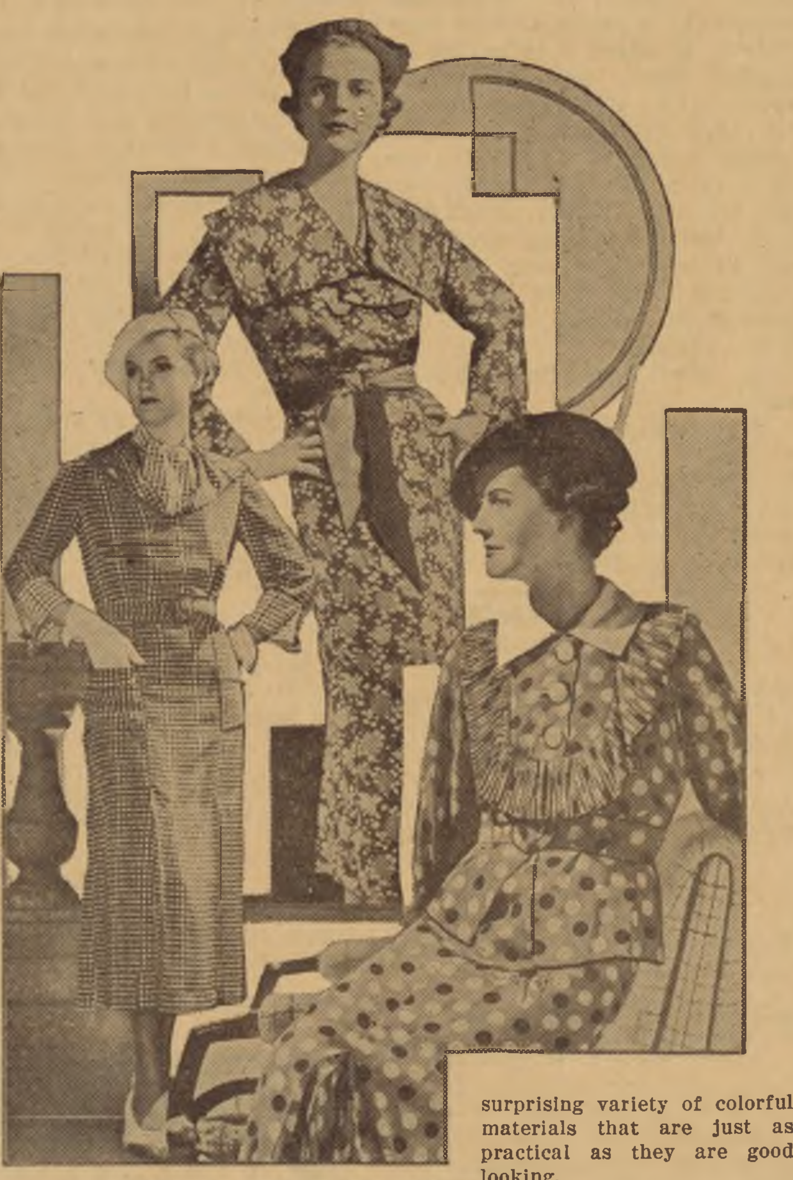
THE SWEET FLAVORED GUM
WRIGLEY'S JUICY FRUIT CHEWING GUM

Prints Gay With Color Now Arrive

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



PLAYING the game of fashion, the next move is to acquire a bright simple daytime wearable frock which has the freshness of the new season in its looks, to wear under your fur coat during lingering snows and departing wintry chill. Later this gay little gown will companion admirably with a chic light wool topcoat in role of a smart springtime ensemble.

If it is your custom to buy ready-mades a casual saunter through leading dress departments will be your budget's undoing, for the new between-season's dresses are not to be resisted. A most exciting feature about the early spring arrivals in the shops is the abundance of frilly ornate neckwear which lends a delightfully feminine air to the new modes.

The woman who likes the fun of making her own simple daytime frocks will find inspiration-plus in the spring fabric displays which in their gay colorings have turned winter into spring within store walls. Walking through the aisles and aisles of fascinating, joyous-looking prints and the rows and rows of voguish linens that flaunt their vivid peasant colorings before enchanted eyes, and the novelty cottons which were never more novel, no matter how conservative you may have been up to this season in matter of colors and patternings you will throw discretion to the winds and indulge to your heart's content in the giddiest, prettiest, most flattering materials you have known for this many a day.

As to the new prints the arrival of the first robin in your garden is no surer sign of spring than is their appearance on the style horizon. You will be delighted, if bewildered, by the surprising variety of colorful materials that are just as practical as they are good looking.

The three frocks shown here illustrate but a fraction of the perfectly beautiful washable prints that are in good taste now for wear under a coat and for later on when no coat is necessary. These attractive dresses are made up in rayon chulla crepe, in the brightest of colorfast colors.

For campus or office wear or for resort wear with light accessories, the tailored frock to the left, of print in a spaced conventional dot design with its ascot type scarf and cuffs of self-fabric, is both smart and practical. There are no fussy details or tricky places that your iron cannot reach in a hurry, and you probably know that you can wash and iron these chulla crepe frocks with no more special care than fine cottons.

The frock with the two-tone tie will carry you through a day that includes shopping, luncheon, matinee and tea. The lines are becomingly simple, the better to accentuate the beauty of the design of colorful leaves against a dark background. It is easy even for the amateur to work with this crepe it stays so accurately in place as you cut out the pattern, with no frayed or curled up edges as you baste it together.

The print that fashions the dress on the seated figure is stunning. Solid black dots together with white dots that are cross-lined with fine red and black lines stand out boldly against a bright red background. The button fastening and the touch of knife pleating are important style details. As you see from the smart models pictured, you do not have to sacrifice any style points this spring when you look for washable dresses.

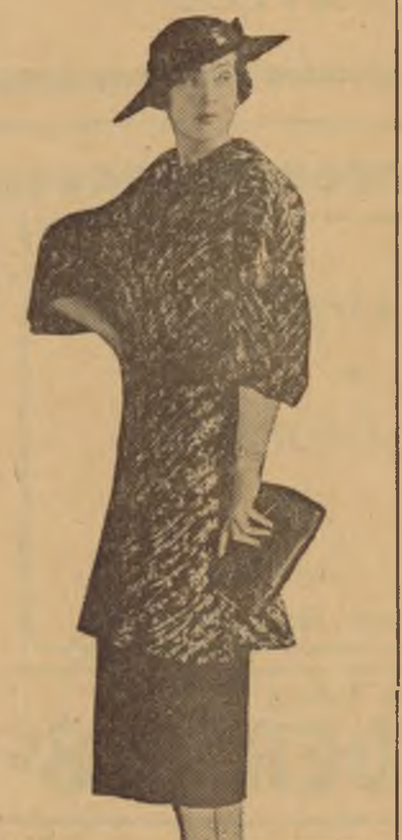
TAFFETA TUNIC

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



Taffeta silk for tunic, for blouse, for the frock entire, for trimming touches is the great hue and cry for spring. The knee-length tunic-blouse pictured is of printed taffeta in exotic coloring. The skirt is black crepe and the accessories are black, introducing white stitchings on shoes and bag. The hat is a very modish sailor of shiny black straw.

NEW STYLES SHOW GREEK INFLUENCE

The Greek influence on current styles has spread so that now it is to be seen in furniture and clothes as well as in the lines of the feminine figure. The popularity of the flat Greek rear profile has made the figure ideal of the Greeks an established vogue.

The influence of this Greek ideal is to be seen in Mainbocher's recent introduction of a gown modeled on the robes worn by ancient Greek dancers. This filmy, graceful garment heralds a turn from the "important" gown, with its stiff formality, to the softness of net and tulle. Its straight skirt is short in front and to the ground in back. There is a garland of fruit or flowers around the waist. Very authentically Greek. And very revealing of the state of one's figure. Hips must be slender, small breasts uplifted in youthful silhouette. The flat Greek rear profile was never more important than to this new and slimly molded style.

To complete the picture, a great vogue for classical Greek furniture is predicted for this spring.

New Fur-Lined Slippers Slender as Satin Pumps

The fur-lined slipper is probably one of the greatest joys the modern woman has ever known. And because it is fur-lined, doesn't mean that it is bulky or clumsy looking. Not at all. It is as sleek and slender as the sheerest satin pump or sandal, but the sole of the foot is protected against cold pavements by a thin, but warm, layer of rabbit or sheepskin, fuzzy side footward.

The strapless brassiere is another boon to smart women. For evening it has certainly become an indispensable item in the society woman's wardrobe. Because of its clever construction of the sheerest and most clinging fabric, it stays perfectly in place without the bothersome need of straps over the shoulders.

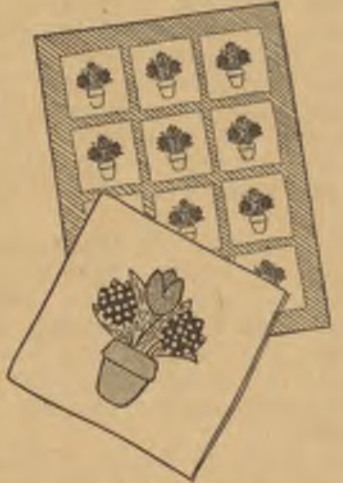
Tulip Has Won Popular Favor

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



The tulip adapts itself so well to applique and quilting designs that it is made use of quite frequently. This combination, showing the entire potted plant, gained popularity immediately after it was released. Tulips in bloom always form a beautiful color scheme, and this tulip pot is also brilliant in prints and greem applique. These stamped blocks are 18 inches, and twelve are required for a quilt about 76 by 97 inches, if you use a nine inch border and four inch strips between blocks. Strips and border widths can be changed to make a quilt any size.

Send 15c to our quilt department for one of these stamped blocks, No. 96-F, and the stamped applique pieces ready to be cut out. Work this up and see what a beautiful quilt can be made of this design. A set of six blocks will be sent for 75c, postpaid.

HUGE TELESCOPE ADDS TO RANGE OF MAN'S VISION

One can imagine the shades of Galileo, Kepler and Newton watching with amazed interest all that happened the other day in the glass works at Corning, N. Y. Sir Isaac Newton, in particular, would have followed the process with thrilled wonder. It was he who more than 250 years ago invented the reflecting telescope and made for it a mirror of polished metal that measured six inches in diameter.

At Corning 20 tons of molten glass were ladled from the vast belly of a fiery furnace to be molded into a mirror 200 inches in diameter. It will be the second of that huge size, and both will go to serve a telescope, greatest of its kind, on a plateau of Palomar mountain, 45 miles north of San Diego. The range of human vision will be extended four times over what is made possible by any existing instrument. It will reach suburbs of space 400,000,000 light years away. Objects on the moon no bigger than a city skyscraper will become visible, and the mysteries of the geometrical tracings on Mars may be solved.

And what, asks the hard-headed reader, will be the practical value of it all? The practical value, in the hard-headed sense has never been considered. But whether or no there comes from it anything that we could class in the category of utility, man will be less a stranger in his universe. That justifies the adventure.

Meanwhile back of the telescope conceived at Mount Wilson observtory lies the Carnegie institute, and back of the Carnegie institute the millions of a money-making Scot, who wrested his wealth from the competitive conflict of steel mills. Thus the sage sweeps from the smelter to the stars.—Chicago News.

Dr. Pierce's Pellets are best for liver, bowels and stomach. One little Pellet for a laxative—three for a cathartic.—Adv.

Will Come to Light

As the man who commits some evil deed has to fear that, notwithstanding all precautions, it will one day come to light, so too he must expect, who has done some good thing in secret, that it also, in spite of himself, will appear in the day.—Goethe.

Character Brought Out by Ills of Depression

Some persons as I see them dealing with the depression, have not succeeded in getting any good out of it. The impact of the economic catastrophe has cracked their faith, crumpled their morale, and left them dilapidated and disillusioned.

Moreover, this has happened, in my experience, not mainly among those who have faced tragic destitution. They frequently have been magnificent. The worst failures I have seen have been among those who, having valued life in terms of wealth or business success, have collapsed when their extravagant ambitions were disappointed. The trouble with them was inside.

On the whole, however, I have been proud of the human character. as I have intimately watched men and women reacting to this depression as though it were a stimulus. —Harry Emerson Fosdick in Cosmopolitan.

How Calotabs Help Nature To Throw Off a Bad Cold

Millions have found in Calotabs a most valuable aid in the treatment of colds. They take one or two tablets the first night and repeat the third or fifth night if needed.

How do Calotabs help Nature throw off a cold? First, Calotabs are one of the most thorough and dependable of all intestinal eliminants, thus cleansing the intestinal tract of the germ-laden mucus and toxines. Second, Calotabs are diuretic to the kidneys, promoting the elimination of cold poisons from the blood. Thus Calotabs serve the double purpose of a purgative and diuretic, both of which are needed in the treatment of colds.

Calotabs are quite economical; only twenty-five cents for the family package, ten cents for the trial package. (Adv.)

Never Treat A Cough Lightly

It Might Be Dangerous

Never send a boy to do a man's work. That's why we say to you, go today to Wilson Drug Co., and get a bottle of that famous, smooth, creamy, creosoted Emulsion known to pharmacists as Bronchuline Emulsion. It's a medicine for grown-ups for coughs that hang on and never seem to let go. No sweet syrup concoction that simply plays with a cough —no dope or habit-forming drugs—it quickly strikes at the source of the trouble. Get a bottle and enjoy a good night's rest.—Adv.

REPEAL CONDITIONS

tem the wets are trying to adopt in Alabama. The statement of Mr. Choate which should completely discredit the wet leaders in Alabama as to the virtue of the state control system, is as follows:

"But if you want to know whether I am for that system I will say that I view it with some doubt. Unless you have a large number of state stores and run for some of them at a loss—unless you provide exactly what the customers want —the bootlegger will be patronized. . Naturally such stores open a new door for graft and corruption. The state monopoly makes possible the building of a political machine. Its hard to get enough honest employees or pay them enough to eliminate dishonesty. Such a system can easily destroy the honesty of even the best administration. I say its a bad system because it is fraught with that danger."

Every control system in America has broken down and crime, drunkenness, driving-while-drunk and bootlegging have resulted. Don't be fooled by the false doctrine. Vote dry and save the people of our great from this shame and distress.

LOST 20 LBS OF FAT IN JUST 4 WEEKS

A St. Louis, Mo., lady wrote: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water every morning before breakfast—a quarter pound jar lasts 4 weeks—you can get Kruschen at Montevallo Drug Co., or any drug store in America. If not joyfully satisfied after the first bottle—money back.—Adv.

"Everyone has creative instinct which, if satisfied, brings the highest human happiness. In some it is buried so deeply, that, left to themselves, they will never find it. In others it is so strong that, unless it gets an outlet, the individual is likely to founder on the rock of "Maladjustment." The Girl Scout program is designed to help young people discover what they like and start them on the road to doing it rightly."

COLLEGE NIGHT PROCEEDS FOR SCHOLARSHIP FUND

The Golds were declared winners of the sixteenth annual College Night at Alabama College following the performance Saturday evening. The winners were led by Misses Isabel Henderson, Mobile and Elanor ,Watson Georgiana. The Purple leaders were Misses Ellie Ayres Burns, Talladega and Aeolian McRee, Greenville.

The annual gift to the college through the College Night funds was in the form of loan scholarships, announced by Miss Margaret Vaughn, president of the Student Government Association, and acknowledged by President O. C. Carmichael.

For the second successive evening Palmer Hall, seating 1,600, was crowded. Included in the Saturday evening audience were a number of distinguished guests, Dr. J. A. Keller, State Superintendent of Education, gave a brief address following the program.

The impersonations presented by the rival sides were especially pleasing. The Purples gave "The Minotaur", and Golds gave "Hiawatha". The toasts, by Misses Alice Green and Mary Nell Kendrick, for the Golds and Purples, respectively, were also delightfully given.

The stunts, entitled "Will Rogers in the Land of Oz" and "Imp-or-a Nero?" added humor and color to the program, while the songs and cheers contributed to the ever apparent enthusiasm. And hundreds of alumnae ,students, and visitors are still talking about College Night of 1935 It was dedicated to the Board of Trustees of the College.

Comments:

From the above you can deduce that your only salvation is an increase in Revenue to amortize your present indebtedness. A 5 mill tax will yield your town approximately $2,000.00 per year.

By living within your normal income and still perform the necessary municipal functions of your city, you can not very well eliminate this floating debt unless extra revenue is provided.

No attempt is made to state the Sewer or Paving Fund indebtedness at this time.

A full and comprehensive report will be furnished you as soon as possible.

Respectfully submitted
W. G. Smith

SMALLER COUNTIES LEAD VICTORY MARCH FOR DRYS

SHELBY FOLLOWS MAJORITY WITH LEAD FAVORING PROHIBITION

Overcoming an early lead establisehd by the modificationist when the returns from Birmingham, Mobile and Montgomery came, the prohibition forces pushed to the front in the three conered refreendum election and increased their lead as returns from the rural sections filtered in.

The election culminated an intense campaign on both sides of the question which carried representatives of each cause into all parts of the state.

The majority of modification votes were polled in Alabama's three largest cities: Birmingham, Mobile and Montgomery, which gave repeal large majorities, while most of the smaller counties went into dry column, more than offsetting the huge voting power of the metropolitan centers. It is estimated that approximately forty-seven counties in Alabama voted dry.

It was thought by some that the bad weather on election day would materially cut down the dry vote, but evidently this was not the case, or else the dry majority in the state is considerably larger than the vote on Tuesday indicates.

The referendum was one of the measures of Gov. Graves who promised the people this in his campaign. It is expetced that this election will bring to an end, for this legislature, the agitation regarding liquor in Alabama.

TOWN COUNCIL URGES STUDY OF FINANCES

We are printing on the front page to-day a financial statement regarding the town of Montevalo. This is being done at the request of the acting mayor and council in order to acquaint the people of the town with the financial conditions.

It is obvious when the statement is read, the council points out, that additional sources of revenue must be obtained if the town expects to pay its obligations. The council publishes this statement in order that you may understand just how urgent the conditions are.

It is hoped that every citizen of Montevallo will read this statement thoroughly.

ALA. ENACTS LAWS ON MORTGAGE LENDING

Washisgton, D.C.— Enactment by the State of Alabama of legislation with respect to mortgage lending should be of the very greatest intrest to all who are concerned with the program of the Federal Housing Administration.

Under the new laws all such financial institutions as state banks and trust companies, building and loan associations and other lending agencies are authorized to make mortgage loans in accordance with the terms and conditions laid down for insured mortgages in the National Housing Act. That is to say, such loans may be made against first mortgages in amounts up to 80 per cent of the appraised value of property and for periods of as long as 20 years, provided that the mortgage requires monthly payments on principal and interest sufficient to pay it off by the time it fallsdue, and conforms in other respects to the requirements of the National Housing Act and the regulat ions laid down by the Federal Housing Administration.

Under this new state legislation, all financial institutions subject to the state law are now placed in a position of competitive equality with the national bbanks operating in the state.

It will be recalled that under the Nationa lHousing Act itself all national bbanks are authorized to mak elong-term loans up to 80 per cent of appraised values against insured mortgages . Thus the last obstacle to complete cooperation on the part of every financial institution in the state has been cleared away.

All institutions which have not already done so now send in their applications to the Federal Housing Administration for approval as lenders under the insured mortgage plan.

New Deal Sighs Relief as Supreme Court O. K's Gold Laws—President Urges Congress to Extend NRA Two More Years.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT and the New Dealers breathed easier after the United States Supreme court handed down its decision sustaining invalidation of "gold clauses" in private contracts, but not on federal bonds. While it was held that the government must pay off its bonds in gold or its equivalent in devalued currency, another ruling that the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction over such cases means that it would be impossible for holders of federal bonds to collect on their old gold basis. In other words, the holder of a $1,000 federal bond is entitled to a technical value of $1,690, but in reality it would be impractical to make any collection of that amount, since the Court of Claims is the only tribunal before which suits against the government may be taken, and other courts may not entertain such suits without a special act of congress.

President Roosevelt

The court also held that those who held gold certificates had no cause of action and could not sue the government. The power of congress to deal with currency was fully upheld.

Not only this country, but the entire world, awaited what the "nine lonely old men" of the Supreme court had to say about the Roosevelt monetary policies. The decision is ranked with the court's decisions in the Dartmouth college cases in 1818 which upheld the sanctity of contract, and in the Dred Scott slavery case in 1857 which had much to do with hastening the outbreak of the Civil war.

Briefly, the ruling said:

1. Congress has the power to nullify promises to pay in gold contained in the bonds of private corporations.

2. A gold certificate is worth only its face value in present devalued currency. Congressional power over the currency includes the right to establish circumstances under which gold certificates need not be redeemed in gold or its equivalent.

3. Congress has no authority under the Constitution to abrogate the payment-in-gold clause of government bonds, but, as no actual damage has been shown, therefore there is no basis for suit for recovery.

The decision was read by Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, who voted with Justices Brandeis, Stone, Roberts and Cardozo in the majority. Dissenters were Justices McReynolds, Van Devanter, Sutherland and Butler, the four so-called conservatives.

Satisfaction within the administration was evident at once.

Justice McReynolds was spokesman for the dissenters. He unleashed a scathing attack on the majority views. His voice vibrant, he said:

"The Constitution as we have known it is gone."

"If given effect, the enactments here challenged will bring about confiscation of property rights and repudiation of national obligations."

"Just men regard spoliation of citizens by their sovereign with abhorrence, but we are asked to affirm that the Constitution has granted power to accomplish both."

"No definite delegation of such a power exists; and we cannot believe the farseeing framers, who labored with hope of establishing justice and securing the blessings of liberty, intended that the expected government should have authority to annihilate its own obligations and destroy the very rights which they were endeavoring to protect."

Notified that Chief Justice Hughes was reading the decision, President Roosevelt went to the cabinet room, where he listened to telephone reports from an aid. Three cabinet officers were at his side. The Chief Executive was prepared to take swift action to protect the credit of the government in case an adverse decision was handed down, but executive orders were unnecessary. The carefully prepared program was not needed.

TWO more years of the NRA, with clarification of policies, more effective enforcement of codes and the granting of "unquestioned power" to the federal government, were urged by the President in a message to congress.

The national recovery act terminates June 16 this year. "Abandonment would be unthinkable," he said, naming the act as "the biggest factor in giving re-employment to approximately 4,000,000 people."

He said congress must maintain the fundamental principles of the act to establish at least a minimum fair trade practice and labor relations standard, pleading that child labor must stay out and that fixing of wages and hours was practical and necessary.

Answering recent protests of labor, he said: "The rights of employees freely to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining should be fully protected."

He urged more strict application of anti-trust laws, condemned monopolies and private price fixing, opposed hindrances to fair competition, and proposed further protection of small enterprises against discrimination and oppression.

His suggestions, if adopted, would keep code violators from behind the bars. "The way to enforce laws, codes and regulations relating to industrial practices is not to seek to put people in jail," he said.

Admitting some mistakes, the President was well satisfied that the NRA had done a good job considering its short existence.

"Only carping critics and those who seek political advantage and the right again to indulge in unfair practices or exploitation of labor or consumers deliberately seek to quarrel over the obvious fact that a great code of law, of order and of decent business cannot be created in a day or a year," Mr. Roosevelt declared.

All details of the legislation were left to congress. While this is in progress, the senate finance committee proposes to conduct the Nye-McCarran investigation of the NRA administration and codes. The judiciary subcommittee reported no funds available, but the inquiry, which has the President's approval, will be attempted without money.

MORE than 100 men were reported killed or wounded in a skirmish in the "demilitarized" zone which lies between Manchukuo and China north of Tientsin. The clash was between the recently formed Peace Preservation corps and the Lwanchow militia. The Peace Preservation corps, which has the approval of the Chinese government, was receiving money and arms from the Japanese, it was alleged. The militia is supported by local Chinese interests.

VICTOR A. CHRISTGAU, demoted from his position of second ranking officer of the AAA in the recent shake-up which involved several alleged radicals, resigned in protest. Chester C. Davis, administrator, had not accepted the resignation and Secretary of Agriculture Wallace was attempting to persuade Christgau to change his mind.

Wallace hinted that there had been differences between Christgau and A. H. Lauterbach, chief of the AAA dairy section, over the milk policy. A protege of Undersecretary Rexford Guy Tugwell, Christgau was also supposed to have encountered "friction" with other members of the department. This gave rise to new rumors that Brain Truster Tugwell will resign before his influence in the AAA is too severely curtailed by the demotion and ouster of his confreres.

Secretary Wallace

Meanwhile amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment act were declared to conceal dangerous, arbitrary and autocratic powers over farmers, manufacturers and distributors of farm products, by the legislative committee of the agricultural industries conference in Washington. The committee cited the provision that the AAA may require that a licensed processor purchase only from those who sign contracts. It charges that the amendments make no provision for the farmer to express himself in the matter of licenses, but contain provisions for price control, markets, production and purchasing. Through indirect restriction of the farmer's market, these provisions are equivalent to a licensing of the farmer, according to the committee. "The entire economic life of communities could be directed from Washington," the committee said.

BRUNO RICHARD HAUPTMANN escaped the electric chair at least temporarily when a writ of error filed by defense attorneys earned him a stay of the execution sentence which was to be carried out at Trenton, N. J., March 18. The Bronx carpenter's life is safe at least until September or October, since a further appeal can be made to the court of pardons if the court of errors and appeals fails to uphold the writ. Lloyd C. Fisher and Frederick A. Pope presented the appeal after a battle with Chief Defense Counsel Edward J. Reilly, who subsequently threatened that either he or Fisher would have to withdraw from the Hauptmann defense. The hearing will probably take place at the next session of the court, which begins May 21.

Part of the dissension among defense attorneys was thought to exist because Reilly never challenged the assumption that the body of the dead baby was that of Lindbergh's son. George H. Foster, former investigator for the defense, declared that seven autopsies were ready to show that the baby could not have been Lindy's because it was four inches taller than Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr.; was in a less identifiable condition than would have been possible in the mild weather following the kidnaping, and was embalmed.

THIRTY-ONE inmates shot and killed a guard in a spectacular break from the Oklahoma state prison at Granite, the only male penal institution administered by a woman warden. Thirteen were captured shortly afterward and a man-hunt is on for the others. The fugitives used two guns which had been smuggled to them, forced a "trusty" turnkey to open up for them, corralled 20 visitors in the visitors' room and, using them for a shield, made their escape. Her prison already the subject of investigation into its moral and managerial standards, the warden, Mrs. G. A. "Mother" Waters, was ordered replaced by a man, Gov. E. W. Marland declaring that a woman "just can't manage" a prison. Defiantly, she refused to clear out until completed investigations vindicated her.

ON THE heels of the Supreme court's gold ruling, former President Herbert Hoover demanded re-establishment of the gold standard in the United States as the only way "to restore confidence in our currency." This could only be done by making the dollar immediately convertible at the present 59 cents of gold—the "modern method of specie payment."

Herbert Hoover

The only living ex-President said that such action would put more of the 12,000,000 unemployed men back to work than any other step. The United States should take the lead in returning to the standard, he said, declaring that, "There is no need to wait on foreign nations before we re-establish the gold standard and restore confidence in our currency. They would be bound to follow some time. They are more afraid of our doing just this than they are of any American 'managed currency.'"

DR. F. E. Townsend of California, whose pension plan for the aged has gained the support of many thousands of America's citizens, went before the senate finance committee and tried to explain how the government could get out of its economic troubles by paying $200 monthly pensions to all persons over sixty, provided each one must spend his $200 for commodities or services within the country each month. The senators didn't treat the proposition with much seriousness.

Chairman Harrison said that with 10,000,000 or more aged, the plan would cost $24,000,000,000 a year. But a 2 per cent tax would raise only $5,000,000,000, leaving a deficit of $19,000,000,000 a year.

"Yes," Townsend said, "but we will not be able to put 10,000,000 on the pension immediately. It took two years to get 4,000,000 men into the army. We would have to examine each citizen for his citizenship and age, as we examined applicants for the army."

A NEW assault on Germany's unemployment problem is announced by Nazi leaders, who will put their plan into effect on April 1. The scheme, the most drastic yet announced, will force most young people to give up their paying jobs and join the government labor service which will send them to construction projects, "voluntary" labor camps, and to farms.

In this way, positions will be opened for older men and those with dependents. All jobs for persons under twenty-five will be state-controlled, and the entire labor market will be under Nazi domination. Jobless at the present time are estimated at 2,000,000 Another feature of the campaign is the setting of a definite goal of 800,000 as the number to be left without work as "chronically unemployed."

GERMANY'S reply to the Anglo-French proposals for a European security pact was not very specific but "welcomed the spirit of trustful discussion between the individual governments" and promised that the reich would examine thoroughly "the whole document concerning the European questions contained in it." The note declared the air agreement might be one step toward solution of other problems, and promised that Germany would examine the question of how to avoid the danger of an armaments race. No mention was made of the proposed Danubian and Eastern pacts.

The German conciliatory attitude toward a pact which recognizes its rearmament was generally considered to put the French in an uncomfortable position, since it was believed that the pact was drawn in terms that were expected to find quick German refusal.

REALM LEADER HITLER refused to exercise his prerogative of mercy and two Berlin society women were beheaded by the official executioner for divulging military secrets. Another woman and a Polish nobleman were sentenced to life imprisonment at hard work. The execution of the two women was carried out at dawn with such secrecy that it was hours before their exact fate could be learned. Officials finally admitted that the women had gone to the block where their heads were severed by a silk-hatted executioner with a medieval battle ax.

STEPS to curb the inroads of Japanese landholders in the rich hemp growing province of Davao are being taken by the Philippine government. Strict application of insular laws governing land holdings by aliens will be made, according to Eulogio Rodriguez, secretary of agriculture, who schemes a wholesale cancellation of subleases of public lands, which he maintains are illegal.

Third Party Rumblings

Washington.—Certain signs of transition are appearing in the political picture. They are becoming clear enough to deserve attention. What they may mean in the ultimate can be made only the subject of a guess—politics being what they are—but interesting circumstances can be noted as of this day and time.

Third party rumblings are beginning to be heard along the whole political front. This is noteworthy because third party rumblings usually are confined to a few sectors, some important, some unimportant. The insurgents, radicals, progressives, and independents all seem to be examining the political horizons of 1936. Roughly, those factions enumerated have been classified as the "sons of the wild jackass," an appellation given them by George H. Moses of New Hampshire, when he was filling a Republican seat in the United States senate. The fact that they remain and that Mr. Moses has passed out of the political picture is not the point. It was his description of them that gave the country its first grouping of the political factions that have consistently kicked over the traces of the major political parties.

The fact that these various groups are again examining the potentialities and the possibilities of 1936 brings directly into question the progress made by the New Deal in its program of reformation or revolution, depending on the political perspective from which you consider the New Deal.

It is two years since President Roosevelt carried his New Deal into the White House. Much water has gone over the dam since. Many experiments have been tried and many have failed. Doubtless considerable progress of a satisfactory form has resulted. Yet, the "sons of the wild jackass" are not satisfied. It may be because Mr. Roosevelt has ceased to pull so many white rabbits out of a hat after the fashion of a magician, that has caused unaffiliated factions so much disturbance. Or it may be because the Republicans, as the opposition party at present, have been utterly stymied in their efforts to perform opposition functions that have proved the temptation for the so-called left wingers to capitalize whatever political opportunities remain for exploitation.

I think it is the general conclusion that the New Deal has not come up to expectations of the left wingers. Perhaps, it might be said that nothing that the New Dealers can offer will be quite satisfactory to the left wingers, for they are difficult to satisfy. Their fertile minds are even more productive of experimental ideas than are the minds even of the brain trusters, and no one has ever said a brain trust mind was not fertile. At any rate, the circumstance is cut and dried and an abundance of material for a third party awaits us by that type of politician.

Observers here agree that one cannot consider the outlook for 1936, and the national elections of that time, without considering the influence that these left wingers may wield. I believe it is conceded everywhere that if Mr. Roosevelt succeeds in leading the country through to a higher level of prosperity than now graces our fortunes the Republican chances to defeat him are very, very low. If, on the other hand, conditions continue as they now are, Mr. Roosevelt certainly is going to have to battle this progressive set-up—to adopt one label for all of them—as well as the conservative group centering largely in the Republicans. From this it becomes plain that a third party probably would draw away from Mr. Roosevelt all of those radicals and liberals who would go beyond his policies, while the Republicans obviously will hold their own conservative strength and sap the Roosevelt forces to some extent by taking conservative independents from that side. All in all, if the third party idea comes through, we can look for a fine political scramble from July to November of the 1936 campaign.

Need Hero Leader

The progressives, including such men as LaFollette of Wisconsin, Norris of Nebraska, and Wheeler of Montana, to name only three, seem to feel that the New Deal program has about jelled. They know, as all political observers know, that there are a good many hundred thousand votes scattered around waiting to be cast in favor of a program much more radical than that to which Mr. Roosevelt has been willing to agree. But the progressives have a distinct problem of their own. It is an entire absence of an outstanding leader of the hero type who can sound the trumpet and call for the progressives to "follow me." My inquiries among all veins of political opinion have given me no clue to the name of an individual who can head up the movement. As I said above, however, results cannot be predicted now and one must add to that statement also that one cannot guess at the leadership of this new movement because it will have to jell further before that leadership appears on the horizon.

It is even possible that these current third party rumblings will mean no more than they have in many cases in the past. This is true because there is not a Theodore Roosevelt in sight at the moment and some astute politicians insist there is not one in the country. If a man of the late Teddy's type and qualities should come to the surface then probably this third party movement would develop into formidable proportions. If one does not show up, I do not see how the progressives will be any more in 1936 than the scattered fragments of a dozen-odd political philosophies.

That brings us to some of the circumstances in congress at the present time. In previous letters I have reported to you that there were signs indicating difficulties for Mr. Roosevelt in holding his gigantic Democratic majorities together in the house and senate. That condition has become somewhat more aggravated than it appeared when I first commented upon it. There have been minor defections breaking loose from the Democratic majority in the house and in the senate with considerable frequency. On one or two occasions the defections were exceedingly large and, when joined with the Republican minority, were almost large enough to constitute the majority strength. The Democratic leadership has wriggled out, thereby saving its skin, but the margin of safety was such as to cause sleepless nights not only in the Capitol, but in high places in the administration.

As one of the signs of this growing discontent, one has only to look back over the last few weeks and observe the continued prodding being given the administration from the Democratic side. The worst phase of this prodding is the apparent willingness of many Democratic representatives and senators to promote investigations.

* * *

Seek Farley's Scalp

There is a faction in congress, all claiming to be good Democrats, who are on the trail of Postmaster General Farley's scalp. There is another bloc of equally good Democrats who would be quite happy to have Secretary Ickes ousted out of the position of secretary of the interior and who squawked loud and long about giving Mr. Ickes control of the $5,000,000,000 relief appropriation.

Within the last few days a gang has banded together on the trail of Donald Richberg, until recently the man who was closest of any in the administration to the President. To add to Mr. Richberg's troubles, he is on the outs with the American Federation of Labor and it must be said that the federation can do a great deal with many members of the house and senate. So, when the legislation for continuance of the National Recovery Administration gets on the floors of congress I think it is likely this group will tear off some Richberg bark.

Governor Eccles of the Federal Reserve bureau, a rather new New Dealer and a fast thinker, has not helped the administration's situation in congress any by his bank bill. He has antagonized the most virulent fighter in the halls of congress, namely, Senator Glass, Democrat of Virginia, by the banking proposals which he sponsored. Senator Glass has always had a following in the senate and he has it now. Whatever he does, therefore, his leadership will be important because he will have not only his own following but the conservative Republicans as well.

The banking legislation, according to the view in many quarters, may turn out to be the focal point, the issue, on which the line of cleavage between the administration New Dealers and the conservatives will be definitely established.

* * *

As to Huey Long

In discussing congressional troubles for the administration no one dares overlook the stocky figure of Senator Huey Long. Huey just does not like Mr. Roosevelt. In fact Huey would like to be President himself. Political ambitions combined with a vitriolic tongue give Huey a broad platform upon which to perform and unless I miss my guess he is willing to be increasingly troublesome to the administration.

Huey knows that the administration is going to overlook no opportunity for harpooning him. Among the executive departments in Washington, one hears hints, and sometimes more than hints, that Huey is vulnerable and that these weaknesses in his armor will be exposed in due course. How much steam the administration can or will turn on is highly problematical. It must be remembered that if, for example, Attorney General Cummings should authorize or direct any action against Huey the Louisiana senator immediately would capitalize those orders as an administration movement to persecute him. In other words the administration is in a spot where it can easily make a martyr out of Huey. The result of that would be to strengthen Huey's position immeasurably. I am told that any fighting back on the part of the administration, in so far as Huey Long is concerned, is going to be given long and serious consideration because Huey is a political bombshell.

SYNOPSIS

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the little lumbering town of Tincup accompanied by Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. He signalizes his coming by defeating Bull Duval, "king of the river," and town bully, in a log-birling contest. Nicholas Brandon the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence. He tries to force him to leave town and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Elliott is arrested. He finds a friend in Judge Able Armitage. The judge hires him to run the one lumber camp, the Hoot Owl, that Brandon has not been able to grab. This belongs to Dawn McManus, daughter of Brandon's old partner, who has disappeared with a murder charge hanging over his head.

Without stopping even for his cap Ben stepped out and crossed to the men's camp. He did not burst into the place, but opened the door casually and slipped inside.

In the center of the room, close by the heating stove above which socks hung from drying racks, stood Bull Duval. His cap was tilted on his head, he leaned backward from his hips, in his uplifted right hand was a quart whisky bottle nearly full and his voice bellowed the words of a woods classic.

In the far end of the room a half dozen men were huddled. From several upper bunks concerned faces watched the Bull. The men were clearly afraid, certain that this hilarity was only a prelude to a melee in which heads would be broken and bodies bruised.

The swaying of Duval's body, as he moved to the measure of the ballad, brought him facing the doorway.

Ben Elliott stepped forward two or three paces and stood watching him. His gaze was steady, and in his eyes danced a warning flame. The Bull broke short his song.

"Good day, Mister Elliott!" he said heavily, in mock respect. "I heerd you was th' new boss at Hoot Owl and likely you're lookin' fer good men. Here's one, Elliott. Here's th' best man you'll get a chanct to hire until th' next blue snow!"

Ben, heedless of the increased tension which showed on the faces of the onlookers, crossed the floor slowly.

"You want to work for me, Duval?" he asked.

"Think I come over to spark you?" the other countered insolently. "Have a drink!"

He extended the bottle, holding it in his great hand, grinning at Ben.

"In the first place, I don't want to hire you," Elliott said. "In the second, there's no hooch allowed in this camp."

He snatched the bottle, swung and sent it crashing against the stove. For a brief moment the hiss of its contents against scorching metal had the place while the Bull's head thrust slowly forward and his small eyes grew red with rage. His lip drew back, exposing yellow teeth.

"Will you walk out, Duval?" Ben asked. "Or do you want me to throw you through the door?"

"Throw me out?" Duval cried thickly. "Throw me out? Why, kid, th' best day you ever seen you couldn't—"

He got just that far in his boast. His hands had knotted into great fists, his body swayed, but before he could strike that first blow or fall into that initial clinch or carry out whatever plan of attack had formed in his truculent mind, knuckles bashed into his lips, driving the words back into his teeth.

It was a hard blow, with everything Ben Elliott had from knuckles to ankle put behind its drive. The savagery with which he struck threw Ben off his own balance, but hard as he had hit, quick as he had been, the blow was not enough to put Duval down.

He closed with a roar, one great arm clamped about Elliott's waist, the other hand smearing across Elliott's face, shoving Ben's head backward as the fingers sought the eyes. Ben twisted away from that menace of gouging, strained against that crushing embrace and struck hastily with both hands. But the Bull's chin was safe against his own shoulder, his forehead burrowing into Elliott's chest for protection and not until Ben lifted his knee with a drive like that of a piston did Duval let go.

He reeled backward then, cursing inarticulately, panting and heaving forward again from his spiked stance on the rough floor as he struck with all his might. His blow went home, a stinging, crushing impact on Ben's cheek bone and Duval's great weight followed, bearing the other to the floor, flat on his back. The Bull spread arms and legs in a smothering sprawl as he went down but before he could pin Ben close and helpless he was wriggling, threshing over, eluding a hand which clawed for his throat, grasping Duval's leg, lifting, straining, finally throwing him off, lurching to his knees and then got to his feet, pitching forward off balance as he ran, and coming to a halt against the bunks.

He faced about sharply to see Duval standing, blood on his mouth, bent forward, arms hooked and extended, like some great jungle creature stirred to killing fury.

Elliott did not try to elude him. With a grunt he charged, head down, one arm before his face, the other drawn back, and when he struck the sound was like that of a club on a quarter of beef. The blow spun Duval half about and the next rocked him. He grappled for Ben, but Ben was gone. He rushed for Ben but Ben sidestepped and struck Duval as he lurched past.

The Bull gave up trying to close. He struck out, now, with renewed savagery as they stood toe-to-toe for a moment. He dodged a brace of drives which, it seemed, would have felled a horse, so great was the effort behind them, and then, feinting, sent in a slashing uppercut.

The great fist landed squarely on the point of Ben's jaw, lifted him from his feet and sent him reeling, clawing the air, over on his back again.

Elliott was dazed by that blow. Bells clanged thunderously in his ears and lights flashed and flickered before his eyes but as he crashed down to the floor Bird-Eye's voice, shrill and frantic, cut through the fog that had folded over him:

"Th' boots! . . . Th' boots!"

Boots, yes. Bull Duval did not fling himself on his prostrate adversary, this time. Erect, he strode forward two measured paces . . . three, and on the fourth he bent backward from the hips, lifted his right foot and raked it out before him; raked those many spikes in the sole straight at the face of his fallen adversary.

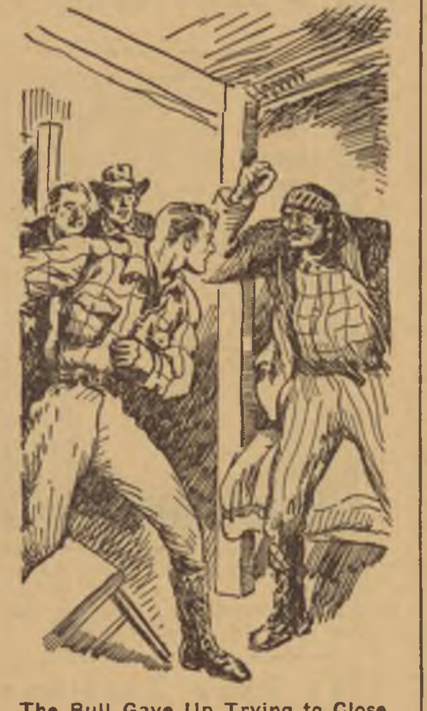
But his river boot only swung across the place where a face had been. One lone spike ripped the skin over the cheek bone; a companion left a bright red trace. Ben had jerked his head sideways, moved it that quarter inch which left his face still a face and not a mass of raw flesh ribbons.

Duval teetered on his left foot, hopping for balance and cursing because he had missed, as Ben, reeling to his feet, shouted:

"Keep out! My fight!" He had seen, as he came erect, Bird-Eye Blaine leap for the wood box and grasp the heavy iron poker. "My fight!" he repeated and his hoarse voice was commanding.

Bird-Eye fell back, clinging to the poker, lips moving. It was Elliott's fight, indeed. He had seen many men fight before, had Bird-Eye Blaine; born to a rough life, he had lived it fully. He had seen countless battles but never had he witnessed such a fury as Ben Elliott loosed then.

He drove out with both fists, heedless of defense, blind to Duval's counter offensive. He shouted as he struck. He used a knee to break another hold, he bit when Duval tried to throttle him with the grip of both hands. He danced as the Bull sought to trample his feet with his river calks, and all the time he was striking. Again and again his hard knuckles found their mark.



The Bull Gave Up Trying to Close.

A bench went over as they waltzed into it. Their combined weight, crashing against the bunks as Duval tried desperately to clinch again, smashed an upright and sent men in the upper deck scurrying. Dust rose thickly. The sink was ripped from its place as Ben drove the Bull into it with a body blow, and a chair was wrecked as Duval caught by another punch, went over it backward with a crash.

Ben stood still, spread legged, breathing hard, hands swinging in a swift rhythm of rage.

"Get up!" he panted. "Get up! I've only started!"

Duval rolled over, his back to Elliott, and shoved himself to his feet.' Not until he had risen and faced about did the other move. Then he closed with another of those flying rushes, with one drive pinned Duval against the wall, with another sent his head crashing against the window frame.

The Bull gave a bubbling roar and tried to grapple. His hands were struck down. He swung mightily, slowly, and missed, and as he went by, off balance, a chopping stroke on the back of the head floored him.

Again Elliott waited.

"Get up!" he cried thickly. "Get up, Duval, and take the rest!"

The other started to move, looking over his shoulder with one eye that remained open. He saw a tall, supple young man, hair awry, shirt ripped open from neck to belt, cheek bleeding, jaws set, stand there swinging one fist as though the knuckles were wild to strike again. He sank back to the floor, shuddering.

On that Elliott relaxed and moved close.

"Enough?" he asked, sharply, prodding the Bull with a toe of his pac.

Duval moaned and shook his head. He made as if to rise again and Ben stepped back, giving him every chance. A mutter arose behind him.

'Finish—th' ——!" a man cried.

But the boss at Hoot Owl would not do that. He asked no odds.

The Bull did not get to his feet. He started to, drew one knee beneath him, heaved and then sank back to a hip. He swore heavily and hung his head, propping his torso by both great hands spread wide on the floor.

"Through, Duval?" Ben asked and it seemed as though his bruised and battered face tried to twist in a grin. The other gave no intimation of having heard. "There's more on tap. Or have you got enough?"

And then, when no reply came Elliott stooped, grasped the Bull's shirt in his hands and half lifted him.

"Let go!" the man blurted. "Let go or I'll—"

He tried to twist away, tried to strike Ben's legs, but his strength was gone, beaten from his great body. He was dragged across the floor, river boots trailing over the boards, straight to the doorway. With one foot Elliott kicked open the portal and with a heave flung Duval, the Tincup terror, into the trampled snow outside.

A half hour later Bull Duval, who had washed his bleeding head and face in the horse trough against the shouted protests of Bird-Eye Blaine that it would be unfit thereafter for his teams to drink from, shoved himself erect and wiped trembling hands on his mackinaw.

The door of the van opened and Elliott emerged. He walked straight to the bully and examined his visible injuries critically.

"Fair job," he said, as though to himself, and grinned. "A fair job, Duval. But remember this: if you ever set one of your feet in this camp again, or on any operation where I'm in charge, I'll give you a licking you'll remember!"

The Bull whimpered.

"I know when I got enough," he said and his one serviceable yet blood-shot eye searched Elliott's countenance. "I . . . I didn't mean no harm," he whined. "I was drunk."

"No, you weren't drunk. If you'd been drunk I wouldn't have hit you. You knew what you were doing. Now, Duval, why'd you come out here this morning? Who sent you?"

Duval looked away.

"Nobody," he said weakly. "I got drunk. But . . . but if you're needin' a man, I can work for a better man than I am."

Ben shook his head.

"No use, chum. You're going to tell me why you came and who sent you. Was it Brandon?"

"No"—evasively.

"Sure? How much did he give you to come here? Or are you on the payroll to do such chores?"

"H—l, he didn't—"

"You're a worse liar than you are a fighter by a mile or two, Duval. Mine was a good guess, wasn't it? What were his orders?"

"Well, he said if I didn't that he'd—"

"Good! That's all I want to know. There's the road. And you can take this little message with you to Brandon: Tell him that he needs to send more and better men here the next time. And as for you: I hire no men who can be hired to fight another man's battles. Make tracks, Duval!"

* * * * * * *

It was a week later.

Old Don Stuart, propped on pillows in the narrow, cell-like room of Joe Piette's hotel, listened to the colorful account that Bird-Eye Blaine, with many gestures and considerable profanity, rendered for him of what had transpired at Hoot Owl since Ben Elliott had taken charge of the operation.

". . . 'nd so he's got th' mill crew a-wurrkin' their blessid heads off for him 'nd 's got thut ragged-pants gang av beet-weeders 'nd hay pitchers thut passes fer a loggin' crew doin' more'n they've evir done in their lazy loives before!"

"Good," gasped Stuart feebly and tried to smile. "Good boy. But . . . he's young and . . . alone against Brandon. It'll be . . . that hard nut he . . . was lookin' for."

"Harrd?" Bird-Eye glared at him. "Harrd! Th' harrder they come, th' better pleased he is! Sure 'nd he's a glutten fer work, Donny! 'Nd th' saints, they have a finger into ut, too, him a-comin' just whin they'd got pore owld Able licked. It'll be a tough foight or I'm a bad guesser, but d—n me eyes, whut a foighter th' lad is!"

A restless light appeared in Don's eyes and his thin old hands fidgeted nervously with the blankets.

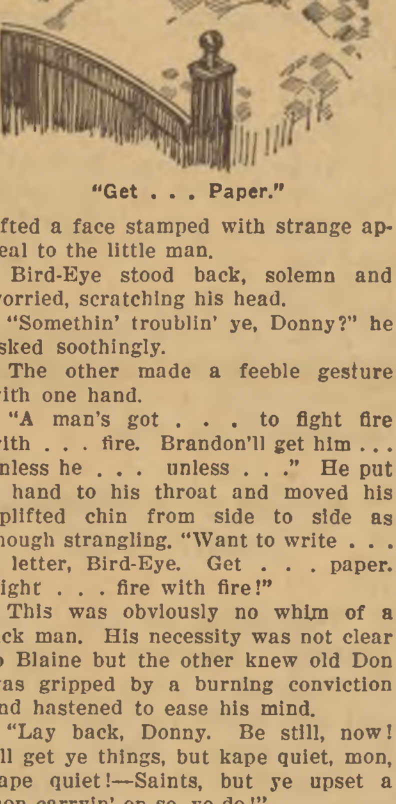
"A tough fight. . . . Oh, he don't know . . . Bird-Eye, what he's up against." He struggled to sit erect and his eyes shone brightly with an odd sort of desperation. "If Brandon can't . . . drive him out . . . one way or another . . . he'll kill him." He gasped and swallowed, evidently making a great effort to talk rapidly. "I'm a coward, Bird-Eye. . . . Been a d—n coward . . . for years. I've been . . . afraid to tell . . . while I lived. Now . . . I'm afraid to die with it . . . on my soul!"

He panted and Blaine looked in alarm at his friend as these last words took on significance for him.

"Lay back, Donny. Dawn't git yerself excited, b'y. . . . Coward? Naw, ye're no coward!"

He grasped the sick man by the shoulders and tried gently to force him back on the pillows but the old fellow resisted.

"Can't die. . . . Can't . . . with it on . . . my soul!" he gasped and lifted a face stamped with strange appeal to the little man.



"Get . . . Paper."

"Somethin' troublin' ye, Donny?" he asked soothingly.

The other made a feeble gesture with one hand.

"A man's got . . . to fight fire with . . . fire. Brandon'll get him . . . unless he . . . unless . . ." He put a hand to his throat and moved his uplifted chin from side to side as though strangling. "Want to write . . . a letter, Bird-Eye. Get . . . paper. Fight . . . fire with fire!"

This was obviously no whim of a sick man. His necessity was not clear to Blaine but the other knew old Don was gripped by a burning conviction and hastened to ease his mind.

"Lay back, Donny. Be still, now! I'll get ye things, but kape quiet, mon, kape quiet!—Saints, but ye upset a mon carryin' on so, ye do!"

He hurried down the stairs, secured writing materials and, from the table in the little office picked up a mail-order-house catalogue. With these he ascended to the sick room again, taking the steps two at a time.

"Here ye are! Book to wroite on, paper, envilope, pencil. . . . I'll sit by ye, Donny."

Stuart did not start to write at once.

He sat staring straight before him in quandary, and then lifted his gaze to the little man who stood at his bedside.

"I'd like to be . . . alone, Bird-Eye," he said in a faint whisper. "I've been alone . . . with it so long . . I think better alone."

The other shrugged.

Keeshonden Thought Great Granddaddy of All Poms

Except for his silver-gray coat of black-tipped hair and his greater size, the Keeshonden too closely resembles the more popular Pomeranian to question their relationship. It is not at all unlikely that he is the great granddaddy of all Poms, which the Germans prefer to call "toy spitz." Previous to their reduction to present-day diminutive proportions, the Pom appeared in size more nearly approaching the 18-inch shoulder height of the Keeshonden, writes an authority in the Los Angeles Times.

Both descended from the Siberian strains of northern dogs . . . prick-eared and carrying bushy tails over the back . . . originated in Germany. The Keeshonden is established as one of that country's oldest breeds, dating back to the year 1552.

Identical are the characteristics of faithfulness, intelligence, watchfulness . their wariness of strangers and friendliness to those they love. Their wedge-shaped fox-like head is framed in a lion-like bushy mane. The nose of the Keeshonden is black, shining from a dark-masked (but not black) muzzle, and the dark eyes, rimmed with light-colored hair. The tail, carried in a curl to right or left over the back, is white tipped. In profile he is a square dog.

Hardy and able to withstand all kinds of weather, he readily adapts himself to any environment.

Murder With Germs
The Atom. Absolute Zero

The Supreme court upholds the President and congress in their legislative and executive action outlawing gold as money in the United States and invalidating "gold clauses" in private contracts.

Arthur Brisbane

The Supreme court's decision is all the more important and gratifying, because every American knows that no consideration outside the letter of the Constitution could have influenced Chief Justice Hughes or his associates.

The Supreme court decision disposes of the statement that President Roosevelt's administration has been proceeding "regardless of the Constitution." The decision will be reassuring to business and the public generally.

From every point of view the beheading of women by Mr. Hitler's government seems to have been a painfully disgusting performance. The women's hands were bound with steel chains—in fear, perhaps, that they might bite through strings or straps. The agile headsman, in full dress, cut off both heads in six minutes. The women were beheaded out of doors in the night, just before dawn, with floodlights for the headsman's work.

Witnesses of the killings praise the composure of the two women. Each walked to her death erect, wrists chained behind her, showing no sign of fear. An eyewitness said: "They set a good example to our men, whom we usually have to drag to the scaffold."

You have read about "war with germs" in the next great outburst.

India proves that it could be done. At Alipore two are condemned to death, convicted of "germ murder." As rich Amarendra Nath Pandey walked along the street he felt a sharp stab. He cried out. A germ poisoner had injected plague germs into his blood. Amarendra died. His murderers were his step-brother and his doctor. Two other doctors, accused, were acquitted.

At Leyden, in Holland, scientists have produced a degree of cold said to approach within one five-thousandth of a degree of absolute zero.

A gigantic electro-magnet, in combination with liquid helium, produces the lowest temperature ever known on earth.

The lowest possible degree of cold, the absolute zero, would be minus 273 degrees centigrade, or minus 459.6 Fahrenheit. At least science thinks so. It used to call the atom "smallest fragment of matter."

Science needs "absolute zero" to help in tearing apart the atom, now known to be a miniature solar system.

Doctor Steinach of Vienna, whose business has been transplanting glands of lower animals to the bodies of men, to prolong youth and extend the years of possible parentage, announces now a "chemical substance" that makes transplanting glands unnecessary. The chemical, called progynon, possibly a compound of "progeny," is available for men or women.

The fact that a demand for it exists proves what fools there are, among men and women, seeking for more trouble, after kind nature has set them free.

Henry Ford views money philosophically as merely an abstract "indefinite, incoherent homogeneity," as Herbert Spencer might have called it. Mr. Cameron, broadcasting, mentioned casually the fact that Mr. Ford in one year lost $68,000,000.

When this writer asked Henry Ford what was the most money he had lost in any year while "changing type" and reorganizing, he replied: "I didn't lose any money. I only distributed some money."

It has been customary at executions in New Jersey state prison to admit relatives of a murdered man, that they may witness the killing of the murderer; very considerate, if relatives of one murdered really desire to see the murderer as he sits in the chair, straining against the straps and frothing behind the mask. It is safe to predict that Colonel Lindbergh will reject the invitation to see Hauptmann put to death for the kidnaping and murder of his child.

James A. Moffett, federal housing administrator, says the country is out of the depression but does not know it. In the West he "found business conditions definitely improved. Los Angeles alone has pledged $100,000,000 in new construction and modernization involving all types of buildings." San Francisco likewise has embarked on an ambitious building program.

Now if 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 idle Americans can get back to jobs, even though they may "not know it," all will be well.

Constipated?

The doctors say . . .
Use liquid treatment

Here is the soundest advice anyone can give on the subject of laxatives. It is based on medical opinion. We want you to have the benefit of this information no matter what laxative you may buy:

The secret of real relief from constipation is reduced dosage. You can't regulate the bowels unless you can regulate the help you give them. That is why doctors use a liquid laxative; the dose can be measured to a drop.

Avoid laxatives that you can't cut down in dosage; especially those that seem to require larger doses than when you began their use.

Under the doctor's care, you usually get a liquid laxative. The right liquid laxative gives the right kind of help, and the right amount of help. Smaller and smaller doses—until you don't need any.

The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara—natural laxatives that form no habit.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF MONTEVALLO

On front page of this issue we are publishing in abbreviated form a statement of the financial condition o fMontevallo. We are pubilshing this at the request of the town council, in order to acquaint the peopleof our town with our financial status.

The council is particularly anxious for the people to know what is going on ,because it is obvious from this statement that something must be done in the matter of securing more revenue.

Since we al live here and anything which affects Montevallo affects us, it is expected that all the citizens will be one hundred per cent behind the council in whatever method, in their best judgement, is selected to secure this extra money.

It is hoped that you will read this statement thoroughly in order to see just the thing we are up against, and also that you may be prepared to offer intelligent suggestions regarding the solution of our town's financial problems.

STAGE SET FOR BIG SPRING SALE

Low Rates Pave Way For Many More Alabamians To Enjoy Comforts and Convenience of Electric Cooking and Water Heating

Low rates, low prices and unusually reasonable terms abundantly complete the triangle of value on which we base our confident prediction that our 1935 Spring sale of electric ranges and water heaters will set a new all time record.

Until you've actually owned an electric range or water heater you can't imagine what a world of comfort and real enjoyment these two appliances can bring into your home.

When you cook electrically you will have many more carefree hours to spend in your garden or with your friends. Your kitchen will be cool and clean, your pots and kettles free from soot and grime. And meals will be tastier, because foods cooked electrically hold their flavor.

An electric water heater is an equal aid to living comfort. It reduces the hot water problem in the home to one simple thing—turning on the faucet. Automatically and silently it maintains an inexhaustible supply of piping hot water at all times. And gives you this constant service without dirt, smoke or flame.

During our Spring sale, beginning March 1st, electric ranges will be offered at prices ranging from $77.50 up and electric water heaters from $60.50 up. Convenient terms will be available.

Drop around and see us sometime soon, and let us figure out for you how economical it is to own and use these two dependable home services.

Its Easy To Have A Lighted Outdoor Living Room

A cozy outdoor garden, enclosed with shrubs and vine covered fences, bordered with flowers, softly lighted by electricity, will prove a wonderfully attractive retreat during hot-weather nights this summer. A little cash, a little ingenuity, a little careful planning can easily transform your back yard or garden into such a fairyland — an "out-door living room" which you, your family and friends will find a place of constant pleasure.

With modern outdoor lighting many beautiful effects can be achieved. For instance, underwater colored lighting for your lily pond, portable spot lighting to reveal the full beauty of your flowering dogwood, your boxwoods, or other shrubs in which you take especial pride. Then there are border lights for your flower beds, and many other lighting methods which are new and novel. Our lighting engineers have made special studies of outdoor garden lighting, and will be glad to advise and assist you with your "outdoor living room." Under the FHA financing plan you can finance such improvements at low cost and on long terms.

MARVELS

How would you like to bathe in melted snow? Folks who live in Iceland actually do! But the melted snow in that part of Iceland is really the hottest spring water in the world. Snow on the peak of the volcano, Hecla, in Iceland, melts and rushes down thru deep ravines in the volcano's seething sides, then underground for 30 miles to emerge finally as steaming natural springs, some of which have a temperature as high as 260 degrees Fahrenheit. Citizens of Iceland use this hot water for bathing and washing clothes.

Alabama has no volcanoes, and no natural hot springs. But many citizens of Alabama do have a hot water supply which is equally abundant and even more convenient. They use electric water heaters.

America's first bath tub was built in Cincinnati in 1842. It was of mahogany, lined with sheet lead, and was exhibited at a Christmas party. Next day, local papers denounced it as a "luxurious and democratic vanity." Medical men took it up and pronounced the bath tub a "menace to health." In 1843, Philadelphia undertook by public ordinance to prohibit bathing between November 1st and March 15th. Two years later Boston made bathing unlawful except when prescribed by physicians. Bath tubs were taxed $30 yearly. And that was only little more than 90 years ago! Today all recognize that the daily ath is a vital part of good health, good breeding and good business. And that hot water—instantly available at any hour through the convenience of electricity, is an essential service in the modern home.

Utility Service Low In Average Budget Dollar

Figures compiled by the National Industrial Conference Board show that the total cost of all utility service to the individual in the United States is only six cents of the average family's budget dollar. That includes electricity, gas, telephone, water, and street railway fare.

Farmers' Dollar Is Biggest Since '29

For the first time since 1929, the farmers' dollar in terms of what he buys is estimated to be worth from 89c to $1.09.

Ford Increases Production

Dearborn, Mich.— The highest January world production of Ford cars and trucks since 1929 was reported today at the home offices of the Ford Motor Company, a total of 105,230 units having been produced during the past month.

This figure represents an increase of more than 70 percent over world production in January, 1934, when 61,813 units were built.

Ford domestic production of V-8 cars and trucks for January of this year was 91,043 units, or an increase of more than 75 per cent over January of last year ,when 51,974 units were produced in the United States . This is the more remarkable because of the fact that the new Ford V-8 cars were not introduced until December 29. The world production for January of this year is the largest for a comparative month since January 1929.

The Ford Company has set its domestic production schedule for February to exceed that of January. Five Ford branches in the United States have reopened for assembly operations, making a total of 16 assembly branches now in operation. Employment here and at all Ford branches now operating is increasing steadily.

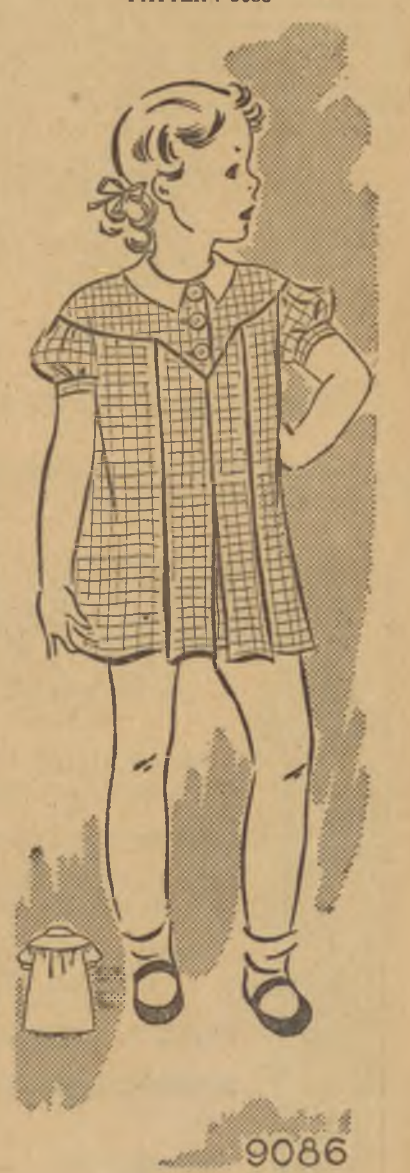
THIS FROCK "JUST RIGHT" FOR PLAY

PATTERN 9086



For a tiny girl's play or school frock nothing could be very much nicer than this adorable little bloomer frock with its quaint over-the-shoulder yoke and prettily puffed sleeves. The frock is simple to slip into, too, buttoning up the front, with only three buttons to be fastened. And it allows plenty of room for romping—the skirt is gathered to the yoke at the back and box-pleated in front. A smart checked or plaid wool or cotton would be pretty for this frock—little girls always seem to love gay colors—and be sure to make up four or five of those crisp white collars in linen or pique. The bloomers, by the way, are included in this pattern.

Pattern 9086 may be ordered only in sizes 2. 4. 6, 8 and 10. Size 6 requires 2⅝ yards 36 inch fabric and ¼ yard contrasting.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

CONCENTRATED CARE

"Did Crimson Gulch go Democratic?"

"Of course," answered Cactus Joe. "We was havin' one quarrel after another, and we jes' decided to let political leaders take the full responsibility for carryin' on the argument."

Not Particular

"May I call on you?" Jinks asked the girl he met at the dance.

"Certainly not! I wouldn't think of it!" she snapped.

"Oh, I didn't mean tonight," he countered. "I meant one wet and miserable night, when I have nothing better to do."

No Wonder

"Is somebody sick at your house, Johnny?" asked the neighbor. "I saw the doctor going in there last night."

"Yep, pop is," replied the kid. "The stork brought mom triplets."

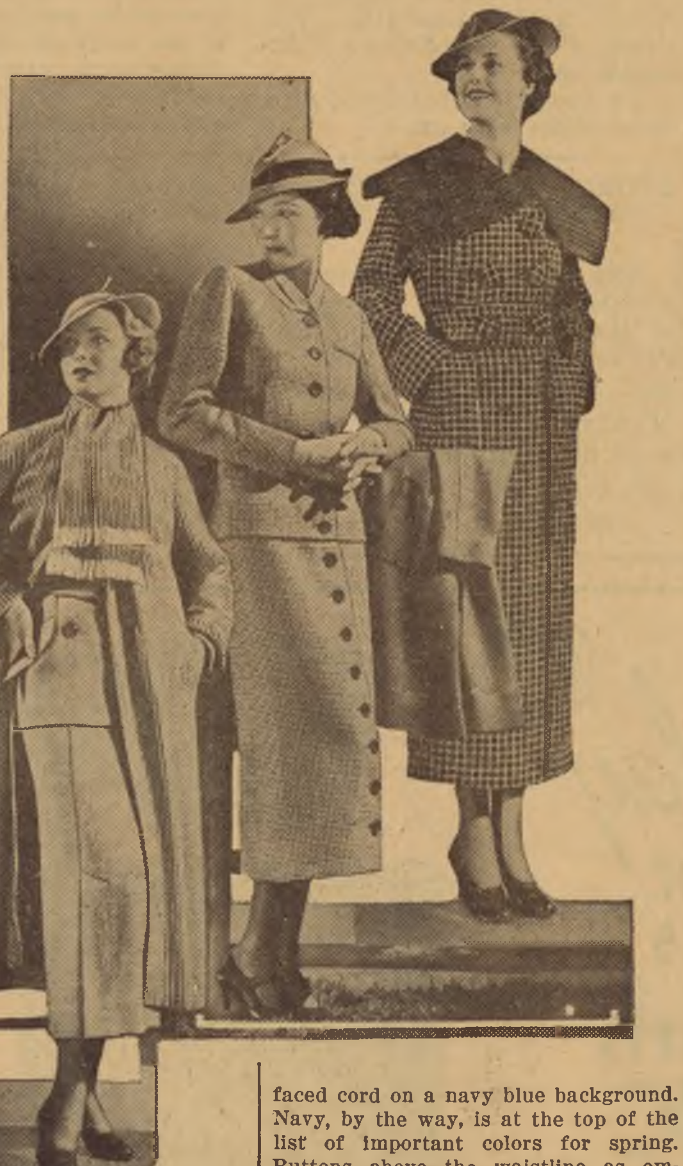
Chic Worsted for Suit and Ensemble

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



WHEN it comes to topnotch swank, audacious color schemes and versatile weaves the new worsteds which go to make up the spring suits and ensembles have arrived at a dramatic moment in their career.

It is nothing uncommon in the advance spring styles parade for an ensemble to be fashioned of a skirt of one woolen, a blouse of another with the jacket, coatee or long coat still another type and color. Yet in the final analysis the entire outfit will have correlated into a perfect unit of highest artistry.

The call of the immediate mode is for the suave and slim fitted tailored suit which has a related topcoat of heavier wool to go with it. The ensemble to the left in the picture is typical of the new suit-with-topcoat movement. The skirt and jacket is of light oxford gray wool, with a long top raglan of two-tone stripe novelty woolen. Later this topcoat can be worn as a separate wrap with other dresses.

Centered in the group is a two-piece tailleur with button trim from neck to hem with a brown oxford topcoat held in readiness, its color being complementary to the brown and white check of the suit. As to checks and stripes and plaids they are all the rage in every conceivable mood of color and weave.

To the right is an early spring arrival—a coat made of a "nifty" new woolen of intriguing novelty. The check is achieved via a shaggy surfaced cord on a navy blue background. Navy, by the way, is at the top of the list of important colors for spring. Buttons above the waistline as employed in the fastening of this coat and the unusually wide belt are also featured details in the incoming fashions. The wide collar is of navy woolen which is quilted in wide welts. Volumes could be written about the new quilted, stitched and shirred effects which embellish dresses, coats, hats and everything in sight which is quiltable, stitchable or shirrable.

The new "companion woolens" brought out this season provide endless opportunity to designers to work out striking and original fashions. A laceweave tweed for the suit with a lacier lighter weight wool for the blouse done in overchecks of white, the ground color matching the color of the suit material gives some faint idea of the handsome combinations in store for fashion's followers this season.

Another model consists of a fitted suit in cinnamon brown wool with a loose topcoat in the same woolen which is striped in white. Then again a light and soft texture suiting in diagonal weave is apt to have a companion woolen in interesting plaided patterning which introduces bright colors and it is even possible to detect an interweaving of gold or silver metal threads.

Rustic weaves in coatings are high style for sportswear, such as a basket weave check in soft spongy texture, one color running one way and a contrasting shade running the other, also handknit and carpet-weave effects which are colorful and sturdy in appearance.

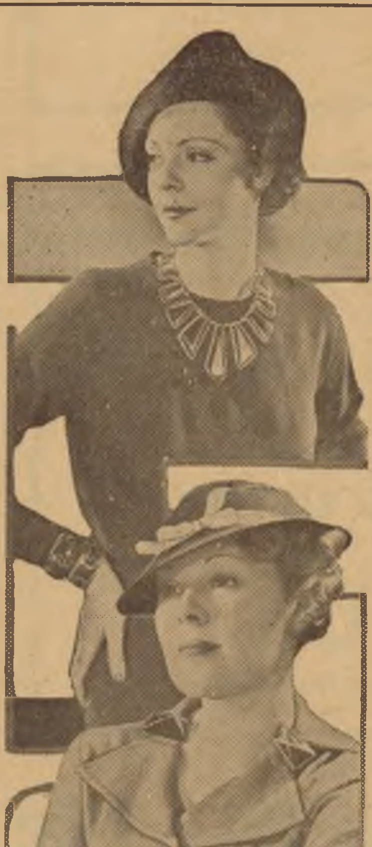
TORTOISE SHELL

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



If you are the sort who wish to be "first in fashion" in your set, appear on the scene wearing either of the tortoise shell sports jewelry ensembles here pictured. Barbaric in design is the stunning necklace of blond tortoise shell catalin with matching bracelets which the stylish young woman above in the picture is wearing with her bright green silk dress.

MUST HAVE VELVET TOUCH TO ENSEMBLE

Even if you don't want to wear a velvet frock or suit this year, there should be a touch of velvet about you if you are to be truly smart and luxurious looking.

A turban of velvet ribbon done with intricate twists and drapings is always good when worn by the picturesque or exotic type. The tall Russian hats of sleek velvet also are good, as are the pill-box hats with rhinestone ornaments and flirtatious veil. These are nice to nestle in huge, upstanding fur coat collars.

Then, too, there are afternoon bags of velvet, many of them shirred and trimmed with rhinestone or mirror ornaments.

Though Clothes Are Very Chic, They Are Practical

Clothes are ever so smart this season, but at no time have the designers lost sight of the practical. Thus we have tunics that are strikingly elaborate, yet they will give new life to an old evening frock, or a long, slim skirt. These tunics come in beautiful fabric, sometimes they are rhinestone studded or else they have bands of spangles. One beautiful model that we saw was of heaviest lame in silver and green. The very draped neck was caught in front with a jeweled ornament, and bracelets caught the loose sleeves into tight cuffs. This could go over an evening dress to make a lovely outfit.

Frothiness

Net dresses, sometimes complemented by capes, all are marked by extreme frothiness about the neck, shoulders and hem lines. Black, turquoise, pink, brown and peach are the favorite colors in order of their popularity.

Sport Sweaters

The smartest of sports sweaters show a decided English influence in their conformation to more or less simple and classic styles, softest yarns and unusual pastel off-tones.

Steps in Fight on Tuberculosis

Periodic Examination Most Favored of Methods in General Use.

"From the public health aspect the school program is distinctly secondary to the effort to control active tuberculosis in the general population," Dr. William Paul Brown says in an article on "The School and Tuberculosis" in Hygeia Magazine. "The periodic examination and the contacts of known active cases is much more productive of results in controlling the disease than the school study of all pupils. No special study of tuberculosis in the schools is warranted unless a good program based on these two more important phases has had consistent promotion.

"The school physician might detect a few active cases in children, if conditions allow careful auscultation of the chest and a careful history of exposure to the infection. However, many children with demonstrable disease may be missed, for at the time they may be negative to auscultation and give a negative history."

Among the benefits of a school program for childhood tuberculosis under public health control are the following:

1. An appreciable number of children are found in need of treatment, and adults with active tuberculosis are discovered.

2. Families who are not utilizing regular medical supervision are given occasion to choose a physician for this prevention service.

3. Chiildren, apparently well, whose parents have taken meager steps to correct overfatigue, dietary errors, neglected teeth and other defects, have therein a rather spectacular reason for correcting these general health hazards before symptoms of tuberculosis have brought a belated warning.

4. Physicians are aided in increasing their function in preventive medicine through the reference to them of such considerable groups of children who are apparently well but wh give a positive reaction to the tuberculin test.

5. Diagnostic service of a high quality is accomplished through the local sanatorium staff and is immediately made available to the family physician who is actually supervising the patient.

Scientific Wonder

Heat into sound is an amazing transformation accomplished by scientists. The warmth of a hand held near the device makes it emit a low growl; lighting a match a few feet away draws a snarl for an answer. The invention can be adjusted so that it is sensitive to a burning match 40 or 50 feet away.

The critic judge of the debates was Proffesor W.D.Perry, of the Birmingham-Southern College English Department.

At the opening of the program a string quartet, composed of Misses Clarice Walton, Alece Cooper, Helen Beard Julia Gwin, was heard; while between the debates a vocal quartet presented two selections. It incuded Misses Lois Thompson, Jewel Pruitt, Margaret Burch and Dorothy Waites, who were accompained by Miss Ruth Schuessler.

AN EDITORIAL

This paper will not take time or space to elaborate in detail on the results of last week's referendum on the prohibition question in Alabama. Yet we feel that in view of certai nfeelings and attitudes which have been expressed over the state, some statements are in order.

In the first place we cannot seriously appreciate the lamenting of som eadvocates of repeal attributing the failure of their cause to one thing and another. The referenndum was the product of repeal advocates. They produced the agitation which resulted in the question being put to the people. The referendum bill was worded as they wanted it, so arranged that sufficient opportunity was given for the man who opposed hard liquors to favor wines and beer. Repealists won their skirmishes in the legislature, particularly when the admendment requiring the publication of all contributors to the campaign to be published, was voted down. The question was a fair one, clear and not misleading. In the face of the returns it is obvious that Alabama does not want her prohibition laws tampered with.

The question of local option has been mentioned since the vote, asking relief for the metropolitan centres of the state. In order to provide local option for Birmingham, Mobile and Montgomery it would be necessary for the legislature to repeal the statutes which the people voted in the referendum should not be modified. It is difficult for us to conceive of the legislature deliberately ignoring the mandates of the people in this question.

With the referendu mover, and the vote recorded, it is now time for active enforcement of Alabama's laws. During the agitation on this question, and especially since the repeal of the federal amendment, there has been throughout the state something of a slacking up on the enforcement of the liquor laws; quite human perhaps, waiting for the issue to be settled. Now that the electorate has given its mandate it is time foraggressive enforcement in county as well as state. We respectfully call upon Sheriff Fore, all Deputies, and Marshall Gardner for a continued diligent enforcement of this law in our county and town, and assure them of the cooperation of this paper in the enforcement of not only this law, but all the mandates of our people.

PROCEEDURE ANNOUNCED BY GRAVES FOR JOBS

Montgomery, Ala. —The proceedure to be followed in awarding the 2,500 jobs Gov. Bibb Graves has made available to the "whitecollar" class in Alabama was outlined at a conference between the governor ,W.G.Henderson, representing the Alabama Refief Administration, and Senator Earle Thomas, the chief executiv'e personal representative in handlng the work assignments.

Gov. Graves emphasized at the outset that the alocation of these jobs was non-political, and that need was the controling factor of eligibility for jobs. He also stressed the fact that when the state undertakes the broad public works programhe has planned, it will be inclined to favor those persons who have shown a willingness to work by accepting the two months employment offered now. These persons will be selected from the so-called marginal "white collar" groups who have not been eligible for relief on the basis of actual destitution. They will be assigned to projects supervised by the various state departments and will be paid an average of $45 per month each for the two months period.

The governor explained that Mr. Henderson will be in charge of the county relief agencies that will handle the qualifying of applicants as to eligibility and that Senator Thomas will have charge of the task of lining up, with the heads of the state departments the jobs for the applicants after they have qualified. Persons to be eligible for this work must be able to certify that there is sufficient income in the family and only one member of a family group will be eligible for one of the places.

"Our first move is to find out from the department heads how many they can use," Mr. Henderson said in explaining the routine. "When we get this information we will allot each county so many jobs to be awarded only to residents of that county. There will be a regular printed application blank which will require the endorsement of some reputable citizen of the county. This is VERY important. After we (the relief agency) qualify them from the standpoint of need it is up to the department heads to qualify them from the standpoint of efficiency. The application blanks are available at the office of the county reief director.

Following are the tentative assignments to each department:

Coast and geodetic survey 100; national reemployment 65; county farm agents 65; Archives and History 65; health and sanitation survey 200; state industries development 20; historical American building survey 45; commodity distribution 97; garden supervisors 800 (approximately one to 50 clients); Federal Housing Administration 200; Child Welfare (clerical) 65; home demonstration agents 65; public works of art, eight women; State Department of Education 40; Agricultural Adjustment Administration 200; cotton acreage reducion 65; administrative planning 50 (if available); occupational classification 150, and miscellaneous 200.

Many Manuscripts In For Contest

Twice as many manuscripts as have been entered in any previous Alabama College play-writing contest have been submitted this year in fifth annual event, according to Dr. W. H. Trumbauer, Director of the College Theatre of Alabama College.

A majority of these plays were written by Alabama citizens, but several manuscripts have been received from other states also. The closing date of the contest was February 15, while the decision and awards will probably be announced near April 15. Prizes will be awarded for the best full-length play and one-act play. The winning plays may be produced at the college later in the season.

Subject-matter for the contest was unrestricted but the use of Southern material was encouraged.

Winners of the 1934 contest were Mrs. Jean Cameron Agnew, LaFayette, with "I Maintain Its Comedy;" and Miss Clara Crenshaw, Greenville, with "Maurice and Fleurette."

President Returns From Vacation to Face Critical Test of His Administration Policies as Foes Stand Firm on Prevailing Wage Clause.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT ended his vacation at Hyde Park and left for Washington where his administration faces serious trouble, involving the prestige of the White House. Capitol Hill is full of lively curiosity over the President's program, and whether he will fight the present congressional defiance of his leadership and go before the people with one of his famed fireside talks, or whether he will agree to a compromise. Mr. Roosevelt at the end of his second year in office faces a predicate in his relations to congress similar to that which confronted Mr. Hoover in 1931.

Sen. Wagner

Unless he regains control his entire program is likely to bog down. The fight hinges on the $4,880,000,000 work-relief program, the first item in the President's budget message and the principal mainstay of his program. Secret conferences at which slices of pork were reported to have been dangled before the avid eyes of revolting senators were said to have been held. A few supporters of the McCarran prevailing wage amendment which wrecked the bill and forced its recommission to the appropriations committee were said to be wavering under the pressure. Senator Robert F. Wagner, who voted for the amendment, acted as peacemaker. He intimated the possibility of a compromise by paying more than the so-called security wage of $50 a month, but still lower than the prevailing rates. Other leaders declared they would not budge from their positions.

Secretary Ickes has been no help to the President in quelling the revolt. In his recent testimony, Ickes was reluctant to tell a senate committee about allocation of $238,000,000 for a naval shipbuilding program. The senators finally pried out information which would indicate that the navy and the speculators knew all about the appropriation, but none of the members of congress knew about it. The money was to be spent at executive discretion, and senators feel this does not auger well for the proposal to hand to Mr. Rosevelt unlimited power in spending the proposed five billion dollar appropriation.

Since next year will bring another Presidential election, a third of the senators will be up for re-election, and all of the house members. They are watching closely the present situation because, if the President is slipping, they want their own records back home in good order.

MUSSOLINI has sent 5,000 more Italian troops to east Africa, making 10,000 that have been dispatched for the possible war with the empire of Ethiopia. With the latest contingent went Gen. Rudolfo Graziani, who will be in command of the expeditionary army. The soldiers were given a fine send-off at Naples, Crown Prince Humbert being present.

Mussolini has set European governments buzzing in a speech in which he roared defiance at Italy's foes, asserting that he could put eight million armed men in the field if necessary. Newspapers during the past few weeks have openly referred to the possibility of a war between Italy and Germany over Austria, and it was thought that Il Duce's speech was made to impress upon the Nazis that he was prepared to defend Brenner pass, although a part of the troops are being used in Ethiopia.

Britain is keeping a close watch on Ethiopian developments, Sir John Simon, foreign secretary, told the house of commons. Simon said that the agreement of 1908 between Italy, France and Great Britain to preserve the political and territorial status quo in Ethiopia is in force and that Britain has drawn Italy's attention to this fact. He added, that the whole trouble is over the frontier between Ethiopia and Italian Somaliland which has never been properly defined.

THE Blue Eagle lost another tail feather the other day, when Federal Judge Nields at Wilmington, Del., held that the collective bargaining provision of NIRA is unconstitutional when applied to companies not engaged in interstate commerce. The administration and organized labor immediately joined in a fight to preserve the validity of Section 7-A, and announced that an immediate appeal would be taken before the United States Supreme court.

The Wagner labor relations bill making Section 7-A the law of the land and outlawing company unions may have to be revised, if Judge Nields is upheld by the high court. The ruling also gives support to opposition now forming in congress against extension of NRA unless it is reorganized.

Judge Nields' ruling was on an injunction suit brought by the government against the Weirton Steel company to enjoin the steel firm from alleged violations of Section 7-A of NIRA and the labor section of the fair competition code of the iron and steel industry. He upheld the right of employees to form company unions for collective bargaining, thus upsetting the claim of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers, that the company intimidated employees and dominated the company union. The court held that the company is primarily engaged in state, not interstate commerce, which congress is not empowered to regulate. Judge Nields stated:

"Power to enact Section 7-A was not conferred upon congress by the 'general welfare' recital in the preamble of the Constitution, nor by the welfare clause, Article 1, Section 8, of the Constitution."

Unless the Supreme court reverses Judge Nields, the decision will prevent the New Deal from interfering with employee-employer relationships of a vast majority of American business.

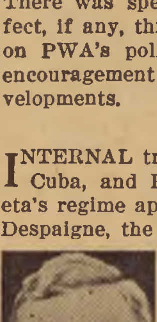
New Deal policies received another jolt the same day when Judge Charles L. Dawson on application of 35 western Kentucky coal operators issued a writ enjoining the government from enforcing the bituminous coal code, reaffirming an earlier decision that the national industrial recovery act was unconstitutional. Judge Dawson declared that the coal mining is an intrastate business, and beyond the power of congress to regulate.

He had previously issued a temporary writ, on petition of the operators on the ground of invalidity of the code, but the court of appeal remanded the case for a finding of fact on the question of irreparable injury. "When the government unconstitutionally interferes with the right of a citizen to do business in his own way, that interference constitutes an injury to the property rights of the citizen," said Judge Dawson, who labeled as fallacious the government lawyers' contention that gains resulting from the coal code should offset losses.

FEDERAL JUDGE W. I. GRUBB of Alabama gave the New Deal a sharp rap that threatens the great electric power development in the Tennessee valley. He ruled that the Tennessee Valley Authority has no legal authority to dispose of surplus power generated at hydro-electric plants on the Tennessee river. The administration is depending on this enterprise to bring about the lowering of private power plant rates, and it was believed there would be an immediate appeal from the decision.

In Washington especial note was taken of the fact that Judge Grubb made permanent an injunction restraining 14 north Alabama cities and towns from negotiating with the Public Works administration for loans to build electric distribution systems. There was speculation as to what effect, if any, this might have nationally on PWA's policy of giving financial encouragement to municipal power developments.

INTERNAL troubles continue to rock Cuba, and President Carlos Mendieta's regime appears tottering. Manuel Despaigne, the only member of Mendieta's cabinet who was in office, has resigned as secretary of the treasury, completing the rout of the ministry brought about by the school strike. And twelve assistant cabinet secretaries have also deserted the administration



Carlos Mendieta

The cabinet resignations began over differences of opinion as to how to deal with the strike of several hundred thousand students and teachers which has developed into a national movement to oust the Mendieta administration. Communist-led labor organizations are ready to throw their strength behind a revolutionary general strike, and the situation is becoming critical. Although armed forces are being held in readiness to quell disorders, there is some doubt as to their loyalty to the president. Col. Fulgencio Batista, army chief of staff, was reported ready to throw his support to Dr. Carlos Manuel de la Cruz for president if the Mendieta government falls, but leaders of the anti-Mendieta movement have indicated Batista's choice would not be acceptable to them.

Terrorism continues rampant. Bombing has become general, railroads have been blown up, and Havana has suffered considerable damage to property.

POSSIBILITIES of a merger of Democrats with Republicans in fighting for repeal of the "pink slip" or income tax publicity section of the 1934 revenue act was seen as Representative Bell, Missouri, pleaded for immediate passage of his bill eliminating the publicity provision.

"Not only is there fear on the part of the people of the country on account of gangsters and racketeers," Bell asserted "but there also is concern among business men, because their competitors will have the opportunity of nosing into their secret files."

A SWEEPING investigation of NRA and charges of graft and corruption was started by the senate, when it passed the Nye-McCarran resolution for a finance committee inquiry after a series of floor conferences between the sponsors, administration leaders, liberal Democrats, and western progressives. Sponsors of the bill originally demanded a special committee to investigate NRA, but finally agreed to the finance committee handling the inquiry. Since the finance committee is headed by Senator Pat Harrison, administration follower, this may mean little. However, it is understood that Harrison agreed that counsel and professional investigators be employed, and also yielded to demands that the committee confer with McCarran and Nye in planning the investigation. If Harrison attempts to "whitewash" the NRA, it is rumored that Nye will take the floor to demand that the inquiry be placed in the hands of the judiciary committee.

THE irrepressible Huey Long announced in Baton Rouge that he will be a candidate for governor of Louisiana in 1936. That may be just more Kingfish conversation. However, it is known that Long has not preferred the office he now holds, and there is some possibility that he may seek the chief executive's chair of his state. When asked what would become of his candidacy for the presidency, he said that being elected governor and being a candidate for president would not interfere with each other.

DETERMINED not to accept the McCarran-Federation of Labor prevailing wage amendment, the administration forces in the senate sent the work relief bill back to the committee. What will happen now to the President's big program is problematical. Senator Byrnes of South Carolina, one of the administration men, declared the measure had met its death.

Senator Huey Long

Insisting he was expressing his own belief and not talking for the President, Byrnes said, "There is no prospect" of reviving the works program and "The committee probably will do nothing about it."

"The President stated that if the McCarran amendment were adopted he would not sign the bill," Byrnes said. "The senate adopted it, therefore, so as far as the works part is concerned, the bill is gone."

He expressed the thought the committee would report out an appropriation of $880,000,000 or $1,880,000,000 to carry out the present relief program for six months or a year.

Adoption of the McCarran amendment by the senate was brought about only after a hard fight and by means of a rather tricky shifting of pairs in which Huey Long took a leading part. It won by a margin of one vote, whereupon Senator Robinson, Democratic leader, moved that the bill be sent back to the committee. This was done, Senator Glass expressing the hope that the committee would report out a bill "that will not be quite so controversial."

Senator Long, who loses no opportunity to pester the administration and to display his political shrewdness, has started a movement for the specification of $2,500,000,000 of the work relief measure's total for the purpose of highway construction. Highway commissions in every state were asked by him to indorse this plan. Long said he had discussed it with some other senators and that they liked it.

CHANCELLOR HITLER has been forced to abandon his intensive campaign against the Jews. Economic pressure has caused Der Fuehrer to give up public manifestations of his cherished anti-Semitic policy, speeches at a meeting of political leaders and Nazi party members indicated. Boycotts, foreign exchange difficulties and other troubles cannot be risked by the reich at the present moment.

THE Saarland after fifteen years under League of Nations rule returned to Germany. Baron Pompeo Aloisi, Italian chairman of the league's Saar committee, took over the reins from Col. Geoffrey Knox, British chairman of the territorial governing commission. The next day, Aloisi formally surrendered the Saar to Germany, and the German flag was hoisted over the territory for the first time since the World war.

CELEBRATING the seventeenth anniversary of the establishment of its army of 960,000 men, Soviet Russia renewed its defiance of "imperialistic" nations. All over the country there were fetes, and the speakers took occasion not only to glorify the Red warriors but also to attack Germany and Japan.

CHANCELLOR KURT SCHUSCHNIGG of Austria paid a visit to Ramsay MacDonald, British prime minister, and was told that while Britain is all for maintaining the independence of Austria, return of the Hapsburgs in Austria and more British loans were strictly tabooed. Incidentally, Britain hinted that Austria might be a little more popular if it were a little less rough with the Socialists and trade unionists. Austria saw the light, and gave a half promise to be a little gentler. Everything was very friendly, but the Austrians came to London without invitation, and little effort was made to conceal official Britain's feeling that they would rather they had stayed at home.

Call It Repudiation

Washington.—Although it has been several weeks since the Supreme court of the United States rendered its history-making decision in the gold cases, there is no slackening in the disturbance from the effects of the administration's gold policies, even in the light of the court ruling. While the court held that congress had no power to enact legislation invalidating the gold clause in government bonds, it said in the same breath that collection from the government by a bond holder was another story. Since the government has taken gold out of circulation, collection appears virtually impossible but the appearance is not going to stop bond holders from seeking what they regard as justice.

It is now apparent that the government's action is going to be regarded both here and abroad as repudiation. That is a nasty word when applied to governments and its repercussions likely will be heard for a good many years.

While the repudiation of the gold payments will affect comparatively few people directly, the significance of the action in a political way is becoming more and more apparent. The repudiation in its effect on the bond holders may be only temporary, but its effect politically will be far-flung.

I think it is generally considered now that the gold question will become a paramount issue in the next political campaign and it is not impossible that it will continue to be an issue over a period of years. This is so because, admittedly, actual damage has been done to American prestige in foreign lands. It is made to appear, therefore, that there will be a combination of international and domestic influences at work henceforth with respect to this government's gold policies.

Domestically, the issue was born in the presentation in congress of two bills designed to restore, partially at least, the status of this government as regards the gold policies to that obtaining before the devaluation of the dollar. Simultaneously, former President Herbert Hoover, in one of the few expressions made since retiring from office, declared his belief that the return of gold payments was necessary and vital to stabilizing conditions and re-establishing the United States in world favor.

Of course, with the abundant Democratic majority in congress, the gold bills will get nowhere very fast. Likewise, Mr. Hoover's expression can and will result only in providing ammunition for New Deal supporters, whose answer to criticism usually is a question whether it is desired to return to the conditions that caused the depression.

Nevertheless, I hear considerable discussion to the effect that these ripples must be considered as only the beginning. They will have the effect of causing many people to think about the problem. Discussions will take place in the homes and in the shops. There will be those who contend for sound money of the old style. Equally vehement defenders of the New Deal will arise. Thus, the issue becomes joined and it is not outside the realm of possibility that monetary questions will become as important in 1936 as they were in the Bryan free silver days.

* * *

Now as to the practical operation of the gold rulings:

Operation of Gold Rulings

There can be no doubt that the Constitution gives congress power to coin money and regulate its value. The Supreme court always has sustained this power. So, when congress, by resolution, allowed President Roosevelt to seize all of the gold in this country and hold it in the treasury, it accomplished indirectly that which it could not do directly. In this way it forced the invalidation of thousands of private contracts wherein one party promised to make payments in gold. Congress made such payments impossible and those who were to be paid have nothing left but disillusionment. As to the gold payment clause in the government bonds the Supreme court said that congress had no right to enact legislation the effect of which was to void that payment. It would seem, therefore, that some way should be found to force the government to make good. That way lies only through the Court of Claims of the United States, and when that court is denied jurisdiction in suits to recover, the bond holder is left with a right, but that right is unenforceable since the government can be sued only with its permission.

On top of these circumstances, and as a long range proposition, considerable attention has been directed to the relationship between the gold clause decisions and inflation. There is a direct link. This link, without doubt, should be watched by all of those who think of the future of this nation.

Inflation of the credit has been going on continuously since Mr. Roosevelt took office. The federal government has set no limit to the borrowing which it will undertake in its program for recovery. The Supreme court has said directly that government securities are worth whatever the administration and congress determine them to be worth because the dollar can be valued up or down as circumstances warrant.

But the value which the President and congress place upon the dollar may differ materially from the value which the public places upon the currency. The public will view the dollar in terms of its purchasing power. Public confidence in the currency, therefore, becomes an absolute necessity and once it is shaken, if history means anything, it takes a long hard pull to get it back. So, if congress shows a willingness to repudiate obligations as it has shown already, the public sooner or later begins to wonder what the end will be.

Throughout history, wherever and whenever such a condition has arisen, the public seeks to convert this doubtful currency into material things, those of a utilitarian value, which it may use. Money, being inedible, is sought to be exchanged for things to eat, to wear, to sustain life and comfort. This is what is meant in expressions "the flight from the dollars," or "the flight" from any other currency about which we have heard so much since the World war.

* * *

Up to the President

The situation in congress in the last few weeks has provided a test for President Roosevelt's political acumen. It has been far more a test of his skill than otherwise would have been the case because for almost two years he has had a congress so obedient to his command as to merit the description of a rubber stamp legislative body. Now, however, the President is faced with the necessity for political maneuvers of the highest order and upon the results of his tactics much will depend. He can cement the links of the Democratic party or he can cause them to disintegrate by the courses he follows.

Some curiosity has been aroused by the fact that for the first time since he became President, Mr. Roosevelt omitted in several instances lately to send administration drafts of bills for congressional consideration. His practice hitherto had been to have the bills drafted in executive departments and submitted with a recommendation that they be enacted in that form. Until some of the factions in congress began to feel their oats this plan worked very well. A change has come over some of them, however, and they are now insisting upon preparation of the legislation themselves.

Another significant development—and this links to circumstances of several months ago—was the presentation by Senator Wagner of New York of a bill to settle labor disputes. This bill does not have administration approval. Indeed, it is quite contrary in some of its phases to the policies which Mr. Roosevelt has sponsored in his dealings with organized labor. It seems important, therefore, that Senator Wagner, who for so long was regarded as Mr. Roosevelt's alter ego in the senate, should deliberately offer legislation to which the administration had not agreed. With further reference to Senator Wagner, who comes from the President's home state of New York, it is interesting, even if unimportant, that Senator Wagner did not support the President in the latter's efforts to force the $5,000,000,000 work relief bill through the senate. Since Senator Wagner has been consistently a New Dealer many observers are asking with some logic whether the New Deal supporters have begun to crack up.

Extension of NRA

It will be recalled that in asking for an extension of the national industrial recovery act for a period of two years, President Roosevelt merely outlined in his message the fundamentals of the plan he was recommending. He carefully avoided reference to any draft of such a bill. It occasioned some surprise that this was so but closer analysis of the situation should have developed reasons therefor. Most of these reasons are traceable directly to the circumstances I mentioned above, namely, the necessity for tactical skill in maneuvering the political strength available to the President.

Observers here generally are agreed that Mr. Roosevelt can turn on full steam and hold a powerful majority in both house and senate. But, the question is whether this is the wiser course from a political standpoint. In this connection the expression has been heard several times lately among Democrats who have been regarded as among the leaders that it might not be well to prod stubborn mules too far.

The best information I can gather is that while Mr. Roosevelt did not offer a draft of NRA extension legislation, a bill will be forthcoming in a couple of weeks from the senate finance committee that will have had prior approval from the White House. Something of the same course is scheduled for the house side. Thus, the picture becomes complete. The fine Italian hand of the administration comes into view.

The story we get around Washington is that this course of action will be used more and more as a means of avoiding open disputes and stubbornness on the floors of the house and senate.

What Is Ahead?
Muscles Soon Old
The Moon Pulls Us
To Toughen Your Legs

In 1914, as the world gradually moved toward war, no one in Europe realized what was happening or going to happen.

Arthur Brisbane

In 1935, as this country moves toward the result of various theories, experiments and efforts, nobody has the vaguest idea of what is really about to happen.

Almost anything might happen. It is possible, and fortunately probable, that what has happened before will happen again, that business and industry will gradually find their way back to normal, and, with officially shortened hours making labor scarce, the slogan may change from "Let the government support me" to "Give me a chance to work and climb to the top."

That may come, and something very different may come.

Once in so often it is necessary for nations and individuals to learn wisdom through first-class failure. That may be on the program for this country at this moment. The wise man will make his arrangements.

Time passes quickly; age comes soon if you depend for success on muscles, legs, arms or eyes. Fifteen years ago Babe Ruth, "home run king," was bought by "the Yankees" for $125,000, highest price ever paid up to that time for a baseball player. Now, only forty-one years old, he is released and goes to the "Boston Braves," who are not asked to pay even a penny for the man that has drawn millions of men and dollars to the club that "owned" him.

As we go around the sun, with the moon circling round our little earth, and our sun doubtless revolving around some other great central star unknown to us, the moon is always pulling at the earth, as a child pulls at its mother's skirt. That pull gradually causes the earth to "slow down" in speed, turning on its axis.

Doctor Nicholson, astronomer at Wilson observatory, says this constant pull of the moon will eventually make the earth turn so slowly that its day will be 47 days long instead of 24 hours.

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings."

Jack Dempsey, who really seemed to like fighting, apart from the profit, in his championship days, discussing other fighters in his "sere and yellow leaf" at forty, says men that refuse to do "road work" should know that "you can't toughen your legs in a chair or posing for pictures."

Legs are not important, but brains are. Young gentlemen should know that you cannot toughen your brains, or make them work better, without thinking.

Chancellor Hitler orders every man in Germany, young or old, to take physical training and be ready to fight. The Spartans trained men early, even taught the young to murder working slaves for practice. They did not last long.

In New York a boy of fifteen, his father "on relief," leaves home and a message saying: "I am going to get a job of my own and help myself."

That expresses the feeling of millions of Americans compelled to be on the dole or relief against their will. It is to be hoped that depression, relief and dole will end before too many Americans lose the habit of work and the desire for it.

Mr. James J. Walker, once mayor of New York, writing a column for the London Sunday Dispatch, supplies one paragraph that he probably meant. Others might remember it:

"After all, the counting of time is not so important as making time count."

Senator Carter Glass, who takes money seriously, says, "We are on a fiat money basis." Possibly, but we seem to be doing better than when we were on a gold basis.

Do you notice much difference? Is money more plentiful, are prices lower? Is not money scarce, is not everything dearer, on the contrary?

Who knows anything about money? Nobody.

Senator Thomas of Oklahoma, for instance, says the United States is still "on the gold basis." Former President Hoover wants to go back to the gold basis, even if we have to be content with a 59-cent dollar, based on the new kind of "expensive gold."

Wiley Post failed in his effort to fly the continent in eight hours because of a mechanical accident. His plan was to travel 40,000 feet up in the stratosphere, where slight atmospheric resistance makes high speed possible. He will try it again. American flyers fortunately are not easily discouraged. If they were, the flying machine would not have been invented here.

"Ave course, Donny," he acquiesced. "Ave course. Oi'll come back when ye're finished."

He went downstairs, rubbers thumping on the treads, but he stood at the bottom a long interval, shaking his head in misgiving and muttering to himself. Then he turned about and crept back as softly as a cat. On the upper landing he seated himself leaning against the thin partition of matched boards which separated him from the sick man.

A half hour, perhaps, Bird-Eye sat there growing cramped and chilly in the draughty hallway. Then he leaped to his feet with a little cry. From within had come a long, retching gasp, a sharp creak of bed springs, a thud on the floor. Blaine burst into the room. The catalogue was beside the bed. Old Don lay half doubled forward, face in the blankets, one limp hand swaying slightly as it dangled over the edge.

"Donny! Donny, b'y, what's up?"

He raised the limp figure, laid it back, stared hard at the face which now seemed so peaceful and then ran excitedly down the stairway in frenzied search of Joe Piette.

In the room was confusion after Doctor Sweet answered the hasty summons. The doctor felt vainly for a pulse, touched the shrunken breast of the old cruiser and then turned away with a significant shake of his head.

The usual things were said and then Bird-Eye and the physician were alone in the room. The little Irishman's eyes brimmed with tears but behind these was an intent look as of one who impatiently awaits opportunity to pursue a specific purpose, and when the others trooped down the stairway he closed the door and returned hastily to the bedside.

"Sure 'nd where is ut?" he asked beneath his breath, riffling the leaves of the bulky catalogue, shaking folds out of the rumpled blankets.

"What are you after, Bird-Eye?" the doctor asked.

"Ah! Here ut be!"

On his hands and knees, peering beneath the bed, he uttered that ejaculation and, reaching far under, rose to his knees with a sealed envelope in his hands.

Across the face was a scrawl, written with an indelible pencil. Blaine scowled as he tried to make out the words, got to his feet, and moved across the room to hold the envelope closer to the light. Doctor Sweet bent over it beside him.

"Ben Elliott," the latter read aloud. "Open this when the nut gets too hard to crack."

The doctor scratched his mustache. He turned his face to meet Bird-Eye's startled gaze.

"It's somethin', Doctor, thut he didn't dare die with on his soul! Somethin' he was fearful to tell if he lived, as well. . . . Somethin' . . ." His hand holding the letter trembled sharply. "Doctor, sure 'nd it's somethin' about th' owld devil himself!"

"Brandon?"

"None other!"

Emory Sweet straightened and gave a long-drawn Hum-m-m.

"Brandon for sure!" Bird-Eye whispered hoarsely. "'Twas Brandon kept Donny out av Tincup fer years, wa'n't it? 'Twas Brandon tuk him when he was hittin' th' booze years back 'nd made a slave av him, he did! It's Brandon who's be'n comin' here ivery night, not loike you or I'd come, but loike a masther 'd come to watch a slave . . . a slave he was a-scared to have around. . . .

"Why was a rich man loike Nick Brandon afraid av 'n owld bum like Donny?" he demanded, shaking the letter almost accusingly close in the other's face. "Who was 't with Faxson when he died? Who was 't put Faxson's murder on McManus?" He gesticulated gravely toward the bed. "Him. . . . Him, Nick Brandon's slave, who wance was a man, who wint to hell with booze, who's truckled to Brandon evir since until his pore owld heart broke!"

"By George, Bird-Eye, it does look as though it might—" The doctor did not finish what he had started to say. Instead he remarked intently: "I'd give a good deal to know just what's in that letter!"

"Oi'll be takin' it myself to Ben Elliott this night. Aw, 'nd won't Misther Brandon squirm whin th' b'y starts in crackin' th' tough nut! 'Nd it's th' justice av the' saints, no less, that Brandon brings Elliott to Able's attintion in a foight over owld Donny."

They went down the stairway together after closing the door softly behind them, Bird-Eye muttering imprecations on the head of Nicholas Brandon.

And even as Doctor Sweet emerged from the dark mouth of the narrow stairway, the front door opened and Brandon himself entered the hotel, stamping new snow from his feet. Others were there, Piette, the drummer, the mill hands; two or three more. But Brandon's attention centered only on the physician.

"Well, Doctor?" he began and it seemed as though his lungs were too filled with air to speak comfortably. "How's our patient this evening?"

Emory Sweet looked grimly into the other's face.

"Old Don has taken the long trail," he said.

"Dead? . . . Dead!" Brandon's voice on the query pinched up a bit. And on the repetition of the word it fell hollowly, with a finality which might have indicated sorrow, dismay or amazement.

But none of these three was reflected in his face. In his dark eyes was just one expression: Relief. Relief! Relief from suspense, from worry; relief from dark and haunting fear!

"You don't say! So the old fellow's gone!" His voice was even now, colorless, assured, as was normal. "Well, it was to be expected, I suppose. Were you with him, Doctor?"

"No; he died alone."

Brandon drew a breath as one will who has asked an important question and received a pleasing or reassuring answer.

"Talking couldn't have helped a man in his condition. He . . . He didn't visit with anyone, did he?"

A queer hesitancy crept into his manner on this as though he shrank from knowing the reply and Doctor Sweet turned to Bird-Eye Blaine inquiringly. But Bird-Eye did not look at the doctor. He was staring at Brandon and as that individual's gaze, following the doctor's, encountered his, the Irishman's lips twitched into a bitter smile.

"So ye're after wonderin' whut pore owld Donny said on his deathbed, are ye?" he demanded and with this challenge stepped down from the stairway and crossed the floor slowly toward Brandon. "So ye're worryin', now, over whut he moight 've said, eh?" He laughed, a dry and mirthless laugh, and came to a halt a pace from the man who was so powerful in Tincup.

"Worrying?" Brandon countered steadily. "You're either drunk or crazy, Blaine!"

"Mebby!"—with a sharp nod. "Mebbe both. But old Donny wa'n't. . . . He didn't do talkin', Misther Brandon. Rid yer moind av that worry. Sure, 'nd he didn't talk to a soul av what was on his moind whin he knowed he lay dyin' . . . No talk! No talk fer somebody to repate 'nd git twisted up 'nd lave out things thut shuld 've be'n told. . . . He wrote ut! That's whut he done, Brandon!"—voice mounting. "He wrote ut! 'Nd he wrote ut fer one who'll make ut so hot that ye'll wish ye was sizzlin' in hell!"

With a sweeping gesture he thrust the envelope close to Brandon's face, so close that the man jerked his head backward sharply.

"He wrote ut!" Bird-Eye cried triumphantly. "'Nd may th' saints speed th' day whin Misther Elliott puts to use th' thing owld Donny had to tell!"

Grimly he poised an instant before the larger man. Then he thrust the letter into his shirt pocket, buttoned his jacket tightly across it, slapped his chest decisively, almost boastfully, and without another word strode to the door and let himself out into the street.

It was late when Bird-Eye stepped into the darkness of the tiny office where Ben Elliott slept at Hoot Owl, struck a match, lifted it high above his head and spoke:

"Hi! Misther Elliott!" Ben roused himself and squinted at the flickering match. "Git up! Rouse up! I got big news fer ye!"

They lighted a lantern and by its glow Ben read the inscription on the letter which Don Stuart had left him as Bird-Eye hastily and excitedly explained.

"There's somethin' in ut Donny'd carried secrut fer long!" he whispered hoarsely. "Ut's to do with Brandon, with fightin' fire with fire, or I'm th' worst guesser in th' woods!"

"Poor old beggar!" Ben said gently.

"Poor! Him?"

"Stuart, I meant. Tough to die that way. And I never got in to see him again!"

Bird-Eye nodded. "Yes. But mebby he's done ye as great a favor as anny man evir done! The's somethin' in ut about Sam Faxson 'nd McManus, I'd bet me last shirt!"

Ben shrugged and turned the envelope over. Then he rose, yawned and slipped it into the drawer of the plain table that did service for an office desk.

"Ain't ye goin' to read ut, even?" Bird-Eye demanded in extreme amazement.

"Why no. You saw the directions: to open it when the nut gets too hard to crack."

Blaine opened his mouth! Words would not come. "Well, I'm domned!" he breathed finally. "Here mebby ye've got th' club thut'll droive him out uv th' country 'nd ye ain't even curious about ut!"

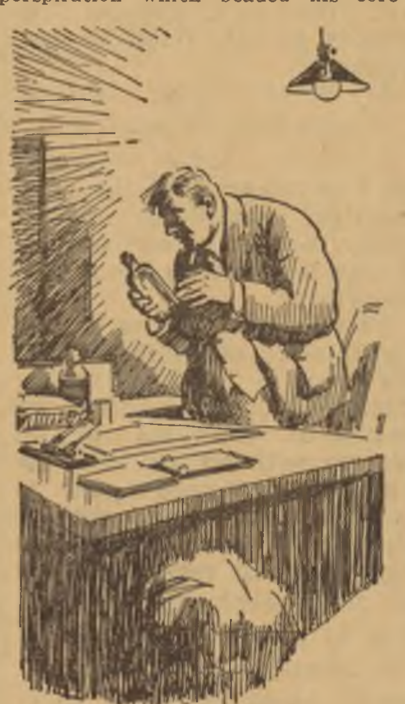
Elliott smiled. "Maybe it's only a sick man's dream, Bird-Eye. And again maybe its' an . . . an ace in the hole. I've never yet looked at my hole card until I'm beaten on the board. I'm not beaten yet, by a long walk."

Bird-Eye scratched his head.

"No, not yet. 'Nd may th' saints kape ye evir as far from a lickin' as ye are now, Ben Elliott! But . . . I'd loike to bet my noble tourin' car thut owld Donny wrote somethin' to do with th' killin' av Sam Faxson, I would!"

"Well, you can't get any takers here, Bird-Eye. Not tonight. Into the bay, now, and let me sleep."

And about the time Ben Elliott burrowed into his pillow and shed responsibility and perplexing problems, Nicholas Brandon turned in the pacing of his cold and otherwise deserted office and cocked his head alertly. It was not unusual for him to be late in his office. But those drawn shades and this quick, restless, harried march to and fro, around and about, and that perspiration which beaded his forehead, and the sudden stoppings and listenings at the slightest sound . . . Those were not usual for a man so thoroughly established in his community that he dictated every phase of its life and activity.



"No. . . . A Clear Head Now!"

He stopped after a time and opening a drawer of his big desk took from it a bottle of whisky, shook himself and muttered softly. For a time he held it in his hands, debating. Then, with finality, muttered: "No. . . . A clear head now!" He shut the liquor in its place and resumed his pacing.

Nicholas Brandon may have ruled Tincup and the surrounding country with an iron absolutism. He may have had a deserved reputation for being a strong man, a resourceful man. But tonight, alone in his office, remembering the words and looks and gestures of Bird-Eye Blaine, a lowly employee of an insolvent venture, seeing again the flash of that letter waved before his eyes, he was no commanding figure. He was a frightened man, a haunted man, battling to retain a hold on himself.

CHAPTER IV

Ben Elliott had been on the job at Hoot Owl just two weeks. Able Armitage was with him for the night. Ben was tireless, it seemed. Since the beginning he had labored daytimes, schemed until late at night, and now he spent another hour with Able, trying, as he said, to make every dime look like a dollar.

"Now, say!" His face took on a curious smile as they finally folded their papers. "I haven't had much time to think about anything but patching up this outfit and getting it to function, but through it all one thing's kept bobbing up so often it's got my curiosity on its hind legs.

"Who was McManus? What about Sam Faxson? Where does the little girl you're guardian for come in?"

"Little girl!" Able said, startled and then smiled. "Why, Dawn is—"

"I keep hearing about these men McManus and Faxson and how Brandon is trying to beat you down so he can cheat the orphan child. How about it all?"

Able's smile died out. He shoved up his spectacles and rubbed his sleepy eyes.

"We haven't had much time for history, have we? I'd intended to give you the story of this property but we've been so concerned with bank balances and paper due and breakdowns and such things that I just haven't had time.

"I'll have to make a long story short; just hit the high spots. First, Nicholas Brandon and Denny McManus came into this country when they weren't much more than boys. They were the first hardwood operators in this country. The pine had been skinned out, but not many hardwood camps had at that time gotten this far from the centers of things. They'd had some experience and a little money but they hit at the right time, picked up a raft of timber for a song and started turning it into a fortune.

"McManus was married and had the daughter, Dawn. Brandon never married. Just when they were swinging nicely, everything running smooth as butter, McManus' wife died. He was as deeply in love as any man I've ever seen and it sent him completely to pot. He took to heavy drinking and got himself in a bad way.

"Of the two, Denny was the more popular. He was friendly, charitable, had a heart as big as a camp stove and as soft as a sponge. He'd go the route for anybody. Why—probably you've never even heard this—when old Don Stuart rimmed the company it was McManus who stood in the way of prosecution. Don had cruised and bought a lot of stuff for them. He always had been a drinker himself and on one spree got into some sort of mess and crooked the company out of three or four hundred dollars. Enough, anyhow, to let himself in for a long term in the penitentiary if they'd pushed it. Brandon wanted to prosecute, all right, but McManus stood up for Don. That was typical of the man: friendly, forgiving, a real human being, if you understand.

"But Mac went to pieces himself. He would be off on a bender for weeks at a time and scarcely get over the shakes before he'd start on another. Finally he got so bad that Brandon sent him out to a hunting camp on the river with a fine old trapper named Sam Faxson. Great old character, Sam. Brandon figured—and it seemed reasonable—that Sam could keep Mac away from booze, you see. He was there a week or so, tapering off gradually, seeing nobody but Sam. Brandon was working away like a nailer, buying up a lot of stuff for himself, probably figuring that if McManus didn't straighten up he'd operate on his own hook. McManus had this Hoot Owl stuff cinched in his own name before he went bad.

"Well, one night we were in the middle of a three-day blizzard and Sam Faxson stumbled into Don Stuart's shanty on the edge of town, shot through the arm and frozen so badly that he died the next afternoon. Don's story"—voice slowing and a finger raising for emphasis— "was that Faxson told him McManus had gotten out of booze and turned ugly and that when he—Sam—tried to prevent him from starting for town after more whisky he went wild at Sam and shot him. He was hit in the arm, had to have help and in trying to get it suffered more exposure than any man could stand.

"Well, that caused a great stir! A party hit straight out for the camp and couldn't find hide nor hair nor sign of Mac. A couple of old trailers agreed that somebody had gone down to the river below the camp the night that Faxson was shot. The Mad Woman is swift at that bend and never freezes. The trail seemed to go right to the edge of the stream and the accepted theory was that McManus, realizing what he'd done, had drowned himself. The fact that nothing has ever been seen or heard of him since lends strength to that supposition.

SYNOPSIS

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the lumbering town of Tincup, with Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. He defeats Bull Duval, "king of the river," and town bully, in a log-birling contest. Nicholas Brandon, the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence, trying to force him to leave town and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Elliott is arrested. He finds a friend in Judge Able Armitage. The judge hires him to run the one lumber camp, the Hoot Owl, that Brandon has not been able to grab. This belongs to Dawn McManus, daughter of Brandon's old partner, who has disappeared with a murder charge hanging over his head. Brandon sends his bully, Duval, to beat up Ben, and Ben worsts him in a fist fight and throws him out of camp.

Two Species of Peafowl; Can Endure All Climates

In a bulletin of the New York Zoological society it is pointed out in an article by Lee S. Randall, curator of birds at the New York Zoological park, that Solomon is credited as the first owner of the peafowl or peacock outside India. The peafowl, while a native of India and Java, is readily adaptable to all climates. The readiness with which the peacock has accepted the conditions of captivity in all sections of the world and in all kinds of climate, Randall says, has made them so common as to cloud our appraisal somewhat, but the fact remains that it is difficult to find a bird to excel them in beauty of form and coloration.

"There are two species of peafowl, the Indian, or blue, and the Javan, or green," Randall says in the society's bulletin. "The Indian fowl is a native of India and Ceylon. It keeps to the low country, seldom going above 2,000 feet. Although it is naturally accustomed to the steaming heat of such localities, it nevertheless has the ability to endure, without discomfort, temperatures well below zero Fahrenheit. It is this adaptability which has allowed the bird to be enjoyed in most countries of the world. The male Indian peafowl is characterized by the deep blue neck and breast, the long, delicate and wonderfully 'eyed' train formed by the upper tail coverts, and the fanlike crest on the head. The female is a dull gray in general with the neck and upper breast iridescent green."

Randall adds that, besides the typical bird, there are three other color varieties: black-shouldered, the white and pied.—New York Herald Tribune.

CONSTIPATION Can be Helped!
(Use what Doctors do)

Why do the bowels usually move regularly and thoroughly, long after a physician has given you treatment for constipation?

Because the doctor gives a liquid laxative that can always be taken in the right amount. You can gradually reduce the dose. Reduced dosage is the secret of real and safe relief from constipation.

Ask your doctor about this. Ask your druggist how popular liquid laxatives have become. The right liquid laxative gives the right kind of help, and the right amount of help. When the dose is repeated, instead of more each time, you take less. Until the bowels are moving regularly and thoroughly without any help at all.

The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara, and these are natural laxatives that form no habit — even in children. Your druggist has it; ask for—

Roosevelt Views On Coal Bill Being Sought

Washington — Speculation has developed over the attitude of President Roosevelt toward the Guffey-Snyder bill signed to set up an alleged onopoly in the bituminous al industry as a Senate subcommittee laid plans for the public hearings on the meaure.

Senator Joseph Guffey (Dem., Pa.), author of the Senate bill, last week went to the White House, accompanied by John L. Lewis, president United Mine Workers of America, to obtain Presidental support of the legislation, and after the visit the Pennsylvania Senator announced the President would give another audience in the next two or three weeks. Upon leaving the White House neither Senator Guffey nor Mr. Lewis indicated the President had given support to the proposal.

With the President's further consideration indicated as necessary before the Administratoin's position is determined, Senator M. M. Neely (Dem., W. Va) has indicated that public hearings on the measure would begin in about ten days before a special subcommittee of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, of which he has been appointed Chairman.

Plans on Coal Bill

Senator Neely is also chairman of the committee sub-committee now considering the 30-hour week bill, and he indicated that as soon as this legislation is disposed of he will turn his attention to the coal legislation.

Members of the sub-committee appointed to consider the Guffey-Snyder bill are in addition to Chairman Neely, Senators Sherman Minton (Dem., Ind.), A. Harry Moore (Dem., N. J.) James J. Davis (Rep., Pa.) and Jesse H. Metcalf (Rep., R. I.).

The Gufey-Snyder bill is formerly sponsored by United Mine Workers, through President Lewis, and it is also understood to have the endorsement of certain coal operators. It is the outgrowth of the row beween operators and labor over the N. R. A. coal code and its sponsors believe that its enactment will assure stabilized operations with reasonable profits for coal producers, while at the same time maintaining mine wage scales now in force or hereafter negotiated.

Opposition to the measure has developed from certain coal operators who believe establishment of such "a monopoy" would inevitably result in higher prices, decreased consumption and additional unemployment of mine labor.

The bill, it is argued by these opponents, provides establishment of a monopoly for the benefitof of those now engaged in the soft coal industry and for a division of business and profits among them.

Restrictions on Profits

To prevent the profits of members of the alleged monopoly from being diluted it is also contended the measure prohibits the opening of new mines without permission of a Government commission.

Price control machinery would be set up to fix prices for coal so as to insure operating profits and miners' wages. This would be done through national and district boards of coal operators and union labor leaders.

Under the present N. R. A. code administration coal prices are determined by regional code authorities composed of producers but including a Government representative with decisions subject to review by the usual N. R. A. advisory councils representing industry, labor and consumer.

The bill provides that mine workers' wages agreements, binding upon producers and miners everywhere, may be legally negotiated if more than 50 percent of the mine workers and operators producing more than 50 percent of the national or district tonnage subscribe thereto.

The Government is asked to issue bonds immediately in the amount of $300,000,00o in order to begin acquiring selected coal lands and mining equipment and a special tax on coal consumers (sales) would be levied to provide for interest and amortization charges.

30 Hour Week Discuss By Paper

"If the 30-hour week would do what its advocates claim, the plan would be wonderful, since the idea is t ogive employment to the ten million persons now idle, but the unhappy thing is that i t won't work.

"Instead of providing work for the ten millions now idle, the 30-hour week would add millions to those now without jobs, for the simple and obvious reason that the consumers would at once curtain their buying because of the greatly increased cost. Thus, instead of providing more work, the plan would decrease employment to a very material extent.

"Nor is this the only unfortunate phase of the situation. Those workers who were able to stay on the payroll would be confronted with such a sharp increase in the cost of living that it would be equal to a reduction of from 25 or 30 per cent in wages. And how many workers are able to stand a thing like that?

"As matters are, millions of persons have a hard time making ends meet, and for the cost of necessities to go up 25 to 30 per cent would be ruinous equipment enough to add more men, so they had to work out a plan without them. A strange situation developed when a process of typesetting became available in plate form which newspapers can buy today for much less than they can pay a man to set up in their own office. With the 30-hour week this ratio of difference will be even greater, and many small town printers will find themselves without jobs while the paper will be published with a large percent of this plate matter. They will become, and many of them are now becoming, family af--fairs, where no one will be just how it will affect you. Viewing the weekly newspaper business, which we are engaged in, with this idea in mind, there is little doubt that a 30-hour week will lay off printers all over the country with none to take their place A peculiar situation in the weekly newspaper field has developed under the 40-hour week that is decreasing employment, which will no doubt go even further in laying off men should the 30-hour week become law. It requires a certain amount of time to produce a week ynewspaper, and if the labor is not available some other means must be resorted to. This is just what has happened under 40 hours. The avercrease wgaes, but the theory is thoroughly unsound for the reasons stated and all wage-earners who wish to avoid decreased employment and marked increases in the cost of living, should array themselves against the proposal.

"Wages must go up before the cost of living goes higher and a mere change in hours increases living cost without increasing pay will do no one the slightest good while doing many great harm." Tuscaloosa News.

It seems that the 30-hour week is destined to serious consideration and it will be well to give careful thought to individual business as to to multitudes of wage-earners and others of limited income.

"The whole theory of the 30-hour week is that it will provide more jobs, no pretense being made that it will inage print shop does not have employed outside the editor's family, setting a few columns of type and buying the rest in plate form.

As we read the exchanges that come to our desk, we find this change rapidly taking place now. Already there are sources of Alabama papers running with 50 percent less type than they used a year ago, and some of them with as much as 75 percent less. Quoting prices just received from the plate people it is now possible to purchase for $1.50 type already set that costs the weekly about $6 to set up in its own shop.--Sylacauga News

"COME EASY" TO BE GIVEN MARCH 22ND

Perhaps every community has at least one charming happy-go-lucky family who follow the fortunes of life with a laugh, up one day and down the next, something always happening to put them on their feet again.

Such is the family around which "Come Easy" is written by the brilliant Felicia Metcalf.

It seems to woman's specialty in the field of playwritting to depict the vagaries of domestic life, and Miss Metcalf has taken advantage of her material in a masterly way. The desire for new dresses which possesses any woman when prosperity hits the home forms a leading theme of "Come Easy," as well as the desire for new furniture; and great is the consternation in this particular family when the bottom drops out of the market and the folks are flat once more.

This sparkling comedy of domestic life will be presented by the Senior Class of the Alabama College Training School on March 22nd at Palmer Hall. Miss Elizabeth Utterback is directing the play, and the cast includes the following; Freida DeMent, Boothton; Gene Lewis, Montevallo; Virginia Moore, Aldrich; Freda Camp, Calera; Ruth Collins, Calera; William Eddins, Calera; Earl Lindsey, Wilton; James Hardy, Newala; Julian Hardy, Newala; William Kroell, Montevallo.

Robert Eddins is Business Manager, assisted by Walton Kroell. Calvin Wilson is in charge of advertising. Gibson Jones will act as stage manager.

"Come Easy" promises an evening of real entertainment and,, as usual, the proceeds wil go to the high school for the buying of equipment.

High School News

Baseball practice was started Monday. Coach Hicks plans on about thirty players being out for practice in a short while. Mr. Hicks is expecting a much stronger team than last year, however, he will miss such stars as Oscar Martin, Hahilton Stone, Joe Harrel, Aubin Knowles, and Alan Gresky. The team Coach Hicks turned out last year won twenty straight games and we hope the team this year will win more.

With the close of the tournament Montevallo now turns her attention toward baseball. We think the basket team made a fine showing in the tournament, defeating Bessemer ,the defending champion Only four teams beat Bessemer this year and Montevallo was one of them. Letters were awarded to: Capitan Charley Findley, Alt. Capitan William Eddings, Joe Wood, John Eddins, Donald Milstead, Grady Nichols, Calvin Wilson, Gibson Jones, Julian Hardy, William Kroell and Walton Kroell.

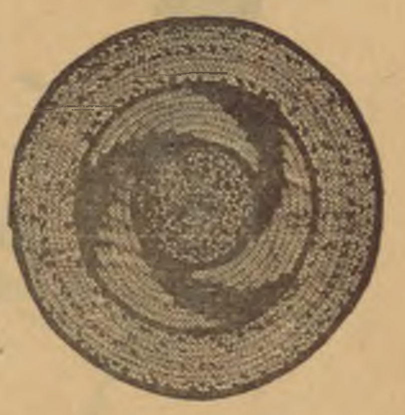
Strong Appeal in Braided Rag Rug

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



Braided rugs appeal to many rug makers because the work is simple and requires no tools. They, however, are not as durable as the crocheted rug, owing to the fact that the braided strands are sewed together, and for this reason we advise to sew with a strong waxed thread.

The above "Pin Wheel" rug measures 35 inches and requires about 4 pounds of cotton rag rug material. The center section has a black background and the 3 section design is white. The outer circle and inner center are of hit-and-miss mixed colors.

Cut strips 1½ inches wide. Fold edges under and then fold again to make a strip about one-half inch wide. Use three strips in braiding.

Start in the center and sew 8 rows of braid around, keeping work flat. Start next row on opposite side of where the previous row ended. Work around, changing colors for 9 rows, as illustrated. To change color sew strips of new color desired to the ones in use. Start again at different place for 8 outside rows, then sew on the last row separately. This rug has 26 rows.

If you are interested in making rag rugs, send 15c to our Rug Department for book No. 25, which contains 26 rugs in braiding and crochet. Instructions are given with each rug, also directions for braiding and crocheting rugs and how to prepare your rags into strips to get the best results.

FITTING NO OBJECT

An old negro recently approached a relief worker and asked for clothing. He particularly wanted a pair of pants.

"What size do you wear?" he was asked.

"A 38."

"I'm afraid I don't have your size," she informed him. "The smallest I have is a size 50."

"Well, that's all right. You see, Miss, we ain't so much for fittin' as for hidin'."

Once Was Enough

Two women were waiting for a bus, which was nearly full when it came along.

"Room for one inside and one on top," said the conductor.

"But surely you wouldn't separate mother and daughter."

"I did once," replied the conductor, as he rang the bell. "but never again."—London Tit-Bits.

Hard Problem for Parents to Face

Child's Worldly Advantage in Balance Against Natural Love.

"My husband and I are faced with a problem which, after wearing us out for months, is as far as ever from a solution. Perhaps you can advise me on it.

"I am the mother of four children of school age. Due to a recent illness, my husband's earnings, never large, have been considerably decreased, and we cannot do for our children what we would like to. A few months ago a dear friend asked to adopt one of them legally. This couple is in very comfortable circumstances and could give the child advantages in life which we could never afford. At first we were overjoyed, but upon further deliberation have found it a terrific ordeal. Unable to part with any one of the children, we have delayed the issue, and the more we think about it, the more of a maze we are in. My husband has decided to leave the matter in my hands. If I turn down the offer I shall, I fear, blame myself for being selfish and shortsighted."

Surely no sterner problem can face a parent! The experienced writer and counselor to whom the pathetic appeal was addressed thus answers it:

"I am reminded of an old American poem depicting a similar situation. Here there are seven children, and here too the parents are torn between love and what they consider duty.

"Which shall it be?" they ask in their distress.
Which shall it be? Which shall it be?
I looked at John; John looked at me.

First to the cradle lightly stepped,
Where Lillian, the baby, slept.
Softly the father stooped to lay
His rough hand down in a loving way.
When dream or whisper made her stir,
And huskily he said, "Not her."
I saw on James' rough, red cheek
A tear undried. Ere John could speak,
"He's but a baby, too," said I.

Poor Dick, bad Dick, our wayward son—
Turbulent, restless, idle one—
Could he be spared? Nay. He who gave Bade us befriend him to the grave.

. . . our eldest lad;
Trusty and truthful, good and glad;
So like his father. "No, John, no,
I cannot, will not let him go."

"The adoption of children by those who are childless has added a great deal to the world's supply of happiness. It has brought joy and a fuller life to foster parents and to many an orphan or under-privileged child a far better life than the one to which he was born, the haven of home and parents' love.

"If we were to consult the various agencies throughout the country who are the medium for most adoptions, I think we should find rare the record of any that was not a success. But it is also rare, to say the least, to consider transferring a child of thinking age from his own parents, to foster parents in the same city and expect to effect an adoption in every sense of the word.

"The feelings of the parents who relinquish the child are not the most important element in the matter. That is the happiness of the child himself. And to me it seems questionable, to say the least, that greater material comforts or luxuries can make up to a child of normal affections, already of school age, for being uprooted from even the poorest home circle of decent parents who love him, and three brothers and sisters.

"Going to live with a wealthy friend but retaining his home ties might be one thing. But when people legally adopt a child they want him to be their child. And if fairness to the foster parents is any consideration it seems to me another point against this scheme.

"I believe my dear reader, your answer too will be found in the concluding lines of the little poem I have quoted:

And so we wrote, in a courteous way,
We could not give one child away;

* * *

Happy in truth that not one face
Was missed from its accustomed place."

Time for Discard

When a rule of etiquette adds nothing of value to beauty, to comfort, to ease or to happiness, it may be set down as a useless rule which may as well be thrown into the discard.—Emily Post.

How Calotabs Help Nature To Throw Off a Bad Cold

Millions have found in Calotabs a most valuable aid in the treatment of colds. They take one or two tablets the first night and repeat the third or fifth night if needed.

How do Calotabs help Nature throw off a cold? First, Calotabs are one of the most thorough and dependable of all intestinal eliminants, thus cleansing the intestinal tract of the germ-laden mucus and toxines.

Second, Calotabs are diuretic to the kidneys, promoting the elimination of cold poisons from the blood. Thus Calotabs serve the double purpose of a purgative and diuretic, both of which are needed in the treatment of colds.

Calotabs are quite economical; only twenty-five cents for the family package, ten cents for the trial package. (Adv.)

F. H. A. Increases Radio Programs

Washington — Interest in Federal Housing Administration radio programs are increasing. Five broadcasts, containing news and information for property owners and the general public, are sent weekly over the leading networks of all national radio chains.

These broadcasts can be heard Sunday at 12:15 p. m., Eastern Standard Time over National Broadcasting Company's red network; Wednes- at 12:45 p. m., Eastern Standard Time over the Columbia Broadcasting System; Thursday at 11:30 a. m., Eastern Standard Time over the red network of the National Broadcasting Company; Friday at 11:15 a. m. Eastern Standard Time through the American Broadcasting Company; and Saturday at 6:45 p. m., Eastern Standard Time over the National Broadcasting Company's Blue network.

"What Home Means To Me" is the name of the Sunday program. This is a series of twenty-six informal talks dedicated to the American home and donated to the Better Housing Program by the General Electric Company. This program features a prominent speaker. Among those who have been heard on this program are Surgeon General Cummings, Kathleen Norris, Otis Skinner. James A. Moffett and Emily Post. An orchestra furnishes a background of home tunes, and the entire program is of exceptional interest.

"The story of $1,000" is transmitted over the Columbia Broadcasting Company's network with "Martha Holems," the Better Housing reporter, following the trail of $1,000 spent for modernization and repairs. She introduces typical American people, discusses their problems with them and acquaints them with the benefits that they may receive from he Better Housing Program. This is a program particularly appealing.

"The House Detective" is another new and well received program of the Federai Housing Administration. coming over the National Broadcasting Company's red network at 11:30 a. m., each Thursday. The "House Detective" investigates many vexing problems confronting home owners. He imparts technical, useful advice and assists in the solution of many problems.

"Ruth Hubbard" is the American Broadcasting Company program heard each Friday at 11:15 a. m. This program brings guests speakers from time to time who are authorities on home matters. Recently Doctor Louise Stanley, Chief, Beureau of Home Economics, Department of Agriculture, was heard. In addition a housing commentator of rare ability is featured.

"The Master Builder," that philosophical, homey, practical, carpenter who goes on the air over the National Broadcasting Company's Blue network each Saturday evening, is perhaps the best known of all the characters appearing on the five Federal Housing Programs.. The "Master Builder" discusses practical ways and means of making home repairs economicaly and satisfactorily. He receives letters by the hundreds asking for solutions to home modernization problems, and to each he replies individually.

The air-time on all ofthese programs ha sbeen donated to the Federal Housing Administration.

INTEREST IS SHOWN IN ARRIVAL OF BIRDS

Montgomery, Ala. — The state game and fisheries department is interested in knowing just how early the martins arrived in Alabama this year.

By now martins, no doubt, have been sighted in various parts of the state, but at the suggestion of George B. Ward, Birmingham bird fancier, the department is polling its field staff to determine which locality was the first to see a martin.

Much interest is attached to the arrival of martins which generally is early in March. They not only are useful in destroying insects, but they fight hawks.

Vestavia, Mr. Ward's beautiful home on Shades Mountain, is a bird sanctuary. Last year the martins put in an appearance there on March 8th. This year the first martin scout arrived one day earlier.

Julian Rice, Montgomery ornithologist, reported the first pair of his colony of purple martins arrived this year on March 5th. This is a little earlier than usual but not a record, he said.

Another martin fan is Pope M. Long of Cordova, who has protected a colony of martins at his home for more than 40 years. He recalls the martins arrived at his place in 1931 on March 2nd, but last year they didn't appear until March 9th.

Mr. Pope required each farm tenant to erect a pole of gourds for martins on every farm owned by him. He uses poles about 25 feet high and places from 12 to 16 gourds on each pole. He says martins prefer gourds and that English sparrows will use them only as a last resort.

President's Proposal to Eliminate Utility Holding Companies Brings Storm of Criticism—Treasury Seeks to Simplify Nation's Currency Structure.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.

THE President's special message calling for abolition of utility holding companies stirred up a storm that probably surprised even such an astute politician as Mr. Roosevelt. The President urged legislation to abolish those holding companies which were unable to show they were operated in the public interest. Representative Bertrand H. Snell, Republican leader, immediately attacked the message, claiming the President had denounced propaganda against the proposed legislation, and was himself propagandizing for it. Utility companies also swung into the battle, and thousands of investors in utility stocks are reported to have sent in protests to congress. In the senate, Norris, Nebraska Republican, offered a resolution calling upon the federal trade commission to investigate propaganda regarding the legislation. The senate approved without debate. Charges were made by utility companies that because of the administration's campaign against public utilities "the value of utility securities has declined by three and one-half billion dollars since 1933." Enactment of legislation to halt holding companies will cause enormous loss to the American family, one power official testified before the house interstate commerce committee.

Senator Norris

GREECE is mopping up the loose ends of the revolt. Some fighting is reported near the Bulgarian border where one regiment, part of the rebellious Fourth army corps, has declined to surrender, but the revolution is definitely over. Eleutherios Venizelos, ex-premier, and leader of the futile revolt, was reported a refugee at Rhodes, the tiny island where Julius Caesar was interned by pirates some 2,500 years ago. Venizelos was transferred there by the Italian government after he had been landed in Italy by one of the rebel warships. Gen. George Karmenos, rebel commander, is safe in Bulgaria, where officials have refused extradition. Rebel prisoners are being concentrated in camps, and courts martial are functioning in Saloniki, Kavala and Larissa, and military trials have begun in Athens. It is believed that only a few of the most flagrant rebels will suffer the death penalty. Venizelos is almost certain to be court-martialed in absentia, and banished forever. His elaborate home in Athens, and his valuable library have already been confiscated and will likely be converted to public use. Italy has refused to extradite him, although it is possible that new demands will be made by the Greek government, who will claim that he took funds from a bank in Crete. Unless he is surrendered, he will probably move to Paris where his two sons now reside.

THE senate smacked down Senator Huey Long for his filibustering tactics and his efforts to amend the administration's $4,880,000,000 work relief measure. The Kingfish had demanded alterations in the work relief bill which would take $100,000,000 away from the $600,000,000 earmarked for CCC work and allot it to students in colleges and universities. Long's amendment was defeated by a vote of 58 to 27. To prove that old adage of "politics makes strange bedfellows," Long was aided by Senator Hiram Johnson of California, who declared that the senate should have something to say about methods for spending the huge sum sought by the President. Johnson has heretofore been considered a supporter of the President. Long's amendment brought forth other proposed changes which should keep the senators busy arguing for several days. The bonus bill may be dragged in and an attempt made to make it a rider to the relief measure, and inflationists and leaders of other "ists" will insist on having their say.

ALL outstanding first Liberty loan bonds have been called for redemption by Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau. The $2,000,000,000 outstanding has been called for June 15, before which time the treasury will likely offer lower interest-bearing securities in exchange for the first Liberties, saving the government some $14,000,000 in annual interest charges.

NEW Deal policies took two more batterings as Federal courts held both the AAA and NRA unconstitutional as regards intrastate business. The administration might find some consolation in another ruling which held the radical Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage bill was valid. Federal Judge Merrill E. Otis, at Kansas City, declared the Frazier-Lemke law was constitutional, "although unwise in many of its provisions and almost incomprehensible matter." Judge Otis said his ruling was not the first in which the act was upheld, and that an appeal was already before the United States Supreme court and a decision might be expected shortly. The AAA was declared invalid as regards intrastate business by Federal Judge Ira Lloyd Letts at Providence, R. I., who issued an injunction restraining Secretary of Agriculture Wallace from enforcing the act against three Rhode Island retail milk dealers, on the grounds that their business was conducted entirely within the state, and the national government had no right to interfere. At Newark, N. J., Federal Judge Guy L. Fake ruled the national recovery act unconstitutional as applied to intrastate commerce "because it attempts an unlawful delegation of legislative authority." The latter decision agrees with that handed down by Federal Judge Nields in the controversial Weirton steel dispute.

CHANCELLOR ADOLPH HITLER'S "diplomatic" cold is over, and he will welcome Sir John Simon, British foreign secretary, to a conference beginning March 24. Accompanying Sir John will be Capt. Anthony Eden, lord privy seal, and disarmament authority. After the Berlin visit Eden will go to Moscow to talk with Soviet leaders. The Berlin conferences will discuss legalization of Germany's rearmament in exchange for an air Locarno pact with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, and an eastern security pact with Poland and Russia. Limitation of armament by all nations will also be taken up. The visit is complicated by a recent announcement that Germany possesses military aviation in violation of the Versailles treaty. Because of this, France may invoke the Rome accord with Italy and Franco-British declaration at London in support of its move to keep the reich from giving the air force official sanction.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY MORGENTHAU revealed plans to dip into profits from gold seizure to retire $674,625,630 of the national debt through the use of gold certificates. Potentially inflationary, it will deprive national banks of the power to issue currency, and save the government an annual interest charge of $13,500,000. Questions on inflationary implications were avoided by treasury officials, but they admitted the plan would "put gold back to work which can be expanded."

Secretary Morgenthau

The maneuver will place in the hands of the federal reserve banks $674,625,630 of gold certificates, which must be used as backing for issue of the same sum in federal reserve notes to retire the bonds. Note issue against the bonds could be expanded if currency demands warranted, to about $1,687,500,000, since a federal reserve note need not be backed by more than 40 per cent gold or gold certificates in like percentage. What will happen will be the immediate simplification of our currency system. The treasury and federal reserve banks will have all the authority to issue money. The plan involves retirement on August 1 of $674,625,630 of 2 per cent federal securities and substitution of federal reserve notes for $657,937,080 of outstanding national bank currency. These bonds will be retired with surplus funds created by devaluing the Roosevelt dollar from 100 cents to 59.06 cents, gold. The total profit was $2,812,000,000.

National bank notes issued by national banks against federal securities represent more than one-tenth of the nation's circulating currency. The administration's program likely means the permanent abandonment of the national bank note which has been used since the Civil war. The circulation privileges expire on all bonds deposited by banks and held in trust by the treasury on July 22, 1935, except on two issues. By calling for redemption, the treasury will retire all securities bearing "circulation privilege" and national banks will no longer have suitable security for issuance of their own notes.

COMPLETE collapse of the administration's long battle to regulate prices in the steel industry is seen in an NRA offer to give up, and in charges by the federal trade commission of a fiasco of collusion. The trade commission insists that price-fixing be scrapped, and no prosecution of steel companies under the anti-trust laws. The trade commission charges that under the code the steel companies have fixed and raised prices on government contracts, in defiance of competitive bidding requirements. Bids were identical, and then steel executives slapped fines of $10 a ton on members who let the government have steel cheaper, the commission says.

DEMONSTRATORS numbering approximately 2,000 marched into the Minnesota state capitol at St. Paul and harangued legislators with demands in behalf of the idle ranks. Threats were made to picket the capitol unless demands were met.

THE house appropriations committee favorably reported out the Department of Agriculture appropriations bill for the 1936 fiscal year. A cut of $513,878,758 was due largely to a $411,022,428 slash in the AAA item. The total bill calls for $653,278,758 of which $570,000,000 would go to the Agriculture Adjustment administration activities. At committee hearings it was explained that it is impossible to estimate how much would have to be obligated because of the crop control program, but the AAA item was a rough estimate of processing tax collections and is not controlling. Henry Wallace, secretary of agriculture, told the committee that the farmers' share of the national income is now about 10.2 per cent, and that it should be 13 to 16 per cent.

Sec'y Wallace

Wallace said "true prosperity" cannot come "until there has been a very material increase in the output of physical goods, industrial goods."

"If in some way it were possible to turn out 50 per cent more industrial goods at a price definitely lower than the present price," the secretary testified, "the result would be to make it possible for agriculture to buy more with the agricultural dollar and there would be more factory workers to be fed in the cities."

EVEN though the senate will not act immediately on the "pink slip" bill to repeal income tax publicity, income tax figures will not be available to the public for six months, according to internal revenue officials. While it is likely the publicity act will be repealed, the house having so voted, it is not anticipated that the senate will act on the measure for some time. Even though the latter might not act favorably, there remains considerable work to be done before the figures can be made public, and income tax payers may be confident that prying neighbors cannot have immediate access to such information. In the senate a drive has been started for higher federal income and corporation taxes.

FRENCH courts have formally indicted 19 persons, including Mrs. Stavisky, for the Stavisky scandal that rocked the government after the financial debacle, which caused losses of millions of francs to investors, had broken, Stavisky, known as "Handsome Alex," died from a gunshot wound as police tried to arrest him in January, 1934.

AFTER twenty months of bargaining, the documents conveying full title to the Chinese Eastern railway to Manchukuo were initialed in Tokyo, thus eliminating Russia as a factor in Manchukuo. The written approval of the agreements was signed by Koki Hirota, Japanese foreign minister; Dr. Constantine Youreneff, Soviet ambassador to Japan; and by Gen. Ting Shih-Yuan, Manchukuoan minister of finance. The consideration was 140,000,000 yen, or about $39,300,000. The documents require that all three governments approve them before their formal signing about March 23. Thus is ended forty years of Russo-Japanese contention for domination.

A NEW gold suit is menacing administration financing and money policies. The suit reopening the question of investors' claims for payment of 1,800 million dollars of government bonds in gold or an equivalent, is brought by Robert A. Taft, son of the late chief justice, over the sum of $1.07. Taft demands either payment of bonds in gold or suspension of all refunding of the gold clause certificates. Before going to court, Taft presented to the treasury a $50 gold clause Liberty bond and four $1.07 interest coupons attached, and demanded gold for both, but was refused. The suit may force the administration to close the loopholes left by the Supreme court decisions, if that is possible.

THE Mendieta administration in Cuba has established a military dictatorship over the island, constitutional law has been suspended, the death penalty for rebels imposed, and military governors designated for Havana and provinces. Washington is watching the situation with keen interest. Bombings and rioting are increasing, according to reports, with ten dead and fifteen injured. The objectives of the opponents of the government is the removal from office of President Mendieta and Colonel Fulgencio Batista, chief of the army. The strike has become almost general, nearly paralyzing all activities in the island. Repressive measures taken by the government to quell the strikers strongly resemble the strong-arm methods prevalent in the Machado regime, according to observers.

THE senate passed the army appropriation bill, and it now goes to the house. The measure adds $20,000,000 to the original bill, making the total appropriation of $400,000,000 almost a record high, and will add 46,250 to our army strength, making the total of enlisted men 165,000. Warm talk flowed freely as the senate debated the measure. Senator Lewis said that conflict might come between Russia and Japan and he asked: "With the army of Russia and the navy of Japan, where do we stand?" Senator McAdoo also speaking in favor of the bill said:

"Unless we want to continue to be a boob nation, we will not hesitate to make this increase in the army. It is justified by the wisdom and the necessities of national defense."

National Topics Interpreted

Washington.—Most observers and thinking citizens have been inclined to take little stock in the talks of Huey Long and Father Coughlin, the radio priest, concerning plans for redistribution of wealth. The consensus has been that their plans sooner or later would fall of their own weight. But it can be denied no longer that Long and Coughlin have developed a gigantic following of people who lack information as to the fallacies of the arguments, however logical they sound, that have been spread by these politically smart showmen.

Long and Coughlin

One reason that serious attention to their proposals is now necessary is that some of their arguments are being advanced from high places in the federal government. I refer specifically to the testimony before the house committee on banking and currency by Marriner S. Eccles, governor of the Federal Reserve board and as such the titular head of the nation's banking system. Mr. Eccles did not quite take a leaf out of Huey Long's book. He approached the position of the Louisiana senator, however, when he proposed a redistribution of income, whereas Senator Long has urged a redistribution of wealth.

Mr. Eccles suggested in his testimony in effect that it would be all right for a man with say ten million dollars in capital to keep that sum, provided his income was redistributed. Mr. Eccles went back to the days immediately following the World war to illustrate his argument and showed that at the top of the post-war boom "one tenth of one per cent of the families at the top of the income received as much as 42 per cent of the families at the bottom of the list." Furthermore, he said that the single average family in the big income class got as much as four hundred families at the bottom of the income list.

"This one-tenth of 1 per cent was unable to use all the income in consumption," he continued. "They therefore had to find an outlet in the investment field. As a result, the capacity to produce increased out of all proportion to the capacity to consume."

So Mr. Eccles took the position that a solution of the depression was a redistribution of this income with the idea that it would increase purchasing power in the lower brackets. The governor offered no explanation of how those in the lower income class were going to obtain possession of the redistributed income of the rich because his argument stopped at the point where the government would take this money by taxation.

That is the recognized weakness of the programs advanced by Senator Long and Father Coughlin, and Governor Eccles showed no ability to solve the problem.

* * *

On top of the outbursts by Long and Coughlin and the serious testimony by Governor Eccles comes Senator Nye the North Dakota progressive, with a bill in the senate to create a central bank. Senator Nye's action has caused many humorous expressions. Here we have a senator who has fostered, even boasted about, progressive ideas and has called himself a liberal. It is necessary only to recall that the father of the central bank idea was the ultra-conservative Alexander Hamilton, the first secretary of the treasury.

Proposes Central Bank

Senator Nye advances a bill with the thought that the central bank would avoid hamstringing of credit. I think financial experts all agree that this is true. The thing which Senator Nye overlooked, however, is that Mr. Hamilton's central bank collapsed and brought ruin and grief to thousands. The reason it collapsed was because in removing control of the banking facilities from experienced bankers, the whole thing had been turned over to the control of politicians who, generally speaking, are experienced only in politics. It seems paradoxical that the North Dakota senator should advance as a liberal scheme the creation of a central bank which one hundred and fifty years ago represented the height of conservatism.

The Nye legislation was offered in the same week that Governor Eccles had proposed in his testimony on the banking bill in the house that the Federal Reserve board should have complete control of the credit expansion and contraction in this country. I believe most persons will have difficulty in considering the two schemes as seperate and distinct.

It is to be noted that there are at least ninety-nine radical members of the house of representatives who are convinced that the federal reserve system has failed of its purposes. Most of them have been repeating without rhyme or reason the accusation that bankers are "refusing" to make loans. They think, therefore, that if there is a central bank or if credit control is placed in the reserve board and taken away from the federal reserve banks where it now reposes there will be additional loans forced out of the commercial banks. History indicates, however, that this is fallacious. No business is going to borrow money when it doesn't need it and neither is any person in his right mind going to make a loan unless he has at least reasonable assurances of repayment.

It will be recalled that President Roosevelt at one time spoke disparagingly of the "refusal" of the bankers to make loans. The President subsequently learned that attempts to pump money out of banks must fail for lack of borrowers. I think everyone acquainted with conditions must agree that the Eccles idea and the Nye legislation mean absolutely nothing in the way of recovery aids, for it has always been true, you can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink.

* * *

The fallacies being put forward by Senator Long and Father Coughlin, and now being nibbled at by Governor Eccles and Senator Nye obviously have been accepted by thousands of people. Senator Long claims that at least six million persons are supporting his scheme. It would seem to be the time, therefore, for citizens to begin to analyze the trend of events, if they are influenced by such leadership.

Stop and Consider

In connection with this trend, it is interesting to observe how much trouble Senator Long and Father Coughlin already have caused for the administration. It must be said frankly, Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers thus far have not found a way to deal with it. They have tried fighting back and each time they have succeeded only in furnishing fresh ammunition for the Long-Coughlin team. Senator Robinson of Arkansas, Democratic leader in the senate, made one of his greatest speeches of criticism of Senator Long's schemes, but the result was only a fresh outburst by the Louisiana senator who took Senator Robinson's own words and converted them to his use.

I reported to you previously that the administration had prepared at one time to take action against Senator Long on income tax questions. But apparently the powers that be have decided that such a course, instead of putting Long back in his place, would make a martyr of him. Among the observers here the belief prevails that the only way Long's attacks can be stopped and his tactics broken up is by ridicule. No politician, however thick-skinned, can stand being made the butt of jokes.

* * *

The administration has told congress that it wants to keep the NRA. Through Donald R. Richberg, sometimes called the assistant president, the administration's position was laid before the senate committee on finance the other day with the suggestion that the proposed new NRA should be confined to matters of interstate commerce. That is, the administration proposes that in extending the NRA for two years from the coming June 16 expiration date, it would apply only to industry engaged in lines of commerce and endeavor that carries across state lines. By the same token, the proposal would eliminate the codes of fair practices from application to the so-called service industry and could not, therefore, apply even to hours and wages in those local plants now under codes.

New Plans for NRA

Mr. Richberg's statement immediately provoked discussion which certainly can be expected to increase in volume because it is in the nature of protests from those who claim to speak for labor. Sidney Hillman, of the NRA high command, immediately protested as did William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. Each of these individuals contended that the NRA would be a worse failure than it is now if it were confined to the narrow definition of interstate commerce and applied only to those industries. Mr. Hillman, who is labor's representative on the National Industrial Recovery board, when he learned of Mr. Richberg's statement promptly struck back with an emphatic observation that the country would not permit such action.

"It is unthinkable," he said, "that congress will withdraw the only protection that the three million or four million underpaid, overworked and helpless workers in the service trades now have. Some of them as a result of the NRA are for the first time in their lives getting one day of rest a week and something a little better than the coolie wages they have been paid in the past.

"I am not interpreting the Constitution. I leave that to the Supreme Court of the United States. But I have been impressed by opinions given by outstanding members of the bar that a condition of keeping millions of workers at starvation wage levels does affect interstate commerce."

Thus is presented the conflict of views between administration appointees, and reconciliation of their views is not made easier by the activity of the labor leaders. It is to be recalled that Mr. Green and some of his stalwart labor associates are not enthusiastic about Mr. Roosevelt and his labor policies any longer. They are not going to be satisfied as easily as they were 18 months ago when they accepted various and sundry promises believing that those promises were to solve labor's economic problems. The administration, therefore, is confronted with genuine danger through the complexity of this political situation.

Mantilla Seems to Be Losing Favor in Spain

The mantilla or lace wrap draped over a high comb is used less and less in modern Spain, writes the Madrid correspondent of the Observer, London. A Spanish writer, Don Jose Romero Cuesta, has written an interesting account of the history of the mantilla, which gives some interesting facts about the most typical features of Spanish dress.

Senor Romero Cuesta traces the mantilla back to the Seventeenth century, but says that it was only early in the Nineteenth century that the lace mantilla came into use. Those worn today are usually made of a mixture of silk and cotton, and one of moderate quality costs $12. As much as $70 is sometimes paid for one.

Family festivities, such as marriages or the visits to the "Seven Churches" on Maundy Thursday, are the only occasions when the mantillas come out into the daylight in these modern days, although rather more use is made of them in some provincial towns, especially in Andalusia. The simple "vela," a mere wisp of black gauze, is, however, much used by all classes of women in Madrid, who prefer to go hatless, but must, of course, cover their heads if they enter a church. The "Manton de Manilla," or elaborate Spanish shawl with decorations, usually in color, is often used at evening festivals.

CHAPTER V

—8—

Still, something did turn up.

Just at breakfast time, while Ben was prowling the mill, admitting to himself that perhaps it was time to look at his hole card—the letter that the old cruiser had sent to him with its intriguing inscription—a stranger behind a light driving team swung into the mill-yard, stopped and tied his horses.

"Well, you had a fire!" he said as Ben approached. "See you've still got a mill standing, though."

"Standing, yes. But that's all you can say for it."

"That's tough!" The man eyed him in genuine concern. "Are you by any chance Ben Elliott?"

"I am."

"Elliott, my name's Blackmore. Glad to see you! I was in here and talked with Harrington week before last and he was saving out some veneer logs for me. I'm with the Veneer Exporting corporation and we're in the market for quite a few cars of stuff. Wonder if I could interest you in a deal. Market's right good and we're in need of some more stuff to fill out a shipment. Maybe with your mill shut down you might be interested."

"That's a close guess. Shoot!"

"I'll pay you a hundred and twenty dollars a thousand for bird's eye maple and ninety dollars for veneer birch; standard specifications and delivery inside of two weeks on, say, thirty thousand. I know you're busy, so I name the top and pass any dickering."

A hundred and twenty. . . . And ninety for birch! Ben's heart leaped but he gave no outward indication of the great relief that surged through him.

"Two weeks?" he asked.

"Yes, and less. Let's see. . . . I'll have to have thirty thousand delivered in just eleven days to be safe in getting 'em to Montreal on time. I'll take fifty thousand at the price but the thirty will have to be loaded and on track first."

"That'll be fast production."

"All of that! But if I can't get the stuff from you I can from Brandon by going up a few dollars a thousand. My cards are on the table, Elliott. Can we deal?"

Ben considered, rubbing his chin with a knuckle. He looked up the road which led toward camp to see a man approaching with that quick, space-devouring stride of the woodsman.

"Had breakfast?" he asked.

"No."

"Blanket your team and go eat. I'll have an answer for you by the time you're through."

As the veneer buyer entered the boarding house Bird-Eye Blaine—the traveler from camp—had reached the mill-yard.

"For the love av—" he began, turning his amazed stare from the mill to Elliott.

"Yes, a fire, Bird-Eye. Never mind that now. Where'd you get your name?"

"Me name! Say, where does anny man—"

"I mean 'Bird-Eye.' Why do they call you that?"

"Oh, that! Why, I looked veneer stuff from Brandon for years until I got sick with disgust fer th' mon."

"I see. And you've been on the Hoot Owl for three years, haven't you? Know the timber pretty well?"

"I know ivery quarter stake by its first name!"

"How much bird's-eye and veneer birch is there within draying distance of the steel? Let's get down to cases. Do you think there's ten thousand? Or fifty?"

"Fifty Naw! Tin?"—twisting his head. "Twict that, annyhow. 'Nd on twinty-three the' 's another bunch av ut. Scattered all through, too, but bunched, Misther Elliott, loike ye don't see ut frequent. That makes ut easy to git out."

"What I'm getting at is this: With the crew I've got could we get thirty thousand out in ten days?"

Bird-Eye shrugged.

"Domn, b'y, but that's a chore! With this crew av hay tossers?" He shook his head. "Mebby you could . . . you 'nd Paul Bunyan. Most men couldn't even so much as start."

"Wait here. I'll see you in a few minutes."

He entered Buller's house where Able Armitage sipped coffee gloomily, neglecting the food on his plate.

"This is the nineteenth," Ben said. "With what bank balance we have, how much must we get together to meet the payroll, that one note that you think can't be renewed and interest on others that'll be due? My figures are all up at camp."

Able considered at length.

"Three thousand might let us out. Why?"

He put that question dryly.

"I just wondered." Ben turned to Buller. "How many men will you need to get the mill in shape? I mean, how many can you use and not have them falling over each other?"

"Oh, four or five besides myself."

Ben nodded. "That'll give me fifteen of the mill crew to throw into the woods." His eyes snapped as he looked back at Able. "A half hour ago I was feeling about half licked. I'll make the three thousand by the first or break my neck!"

"What are you getting at, Benny?" Able demanded.

"This." Ben hitched his chair close to the table and with a relish which indicated the love of battle, sketched his plan.

By noon that plan was in partial operation. Bird-Eye Blaine, his duties as barn boss temporarily delegated to another, and Ben Elliott cruised through the timber north of camp, belt axes in their hands. And in the morning the camp crew, augmented by fifteen men from the mill, left off the work of felling timber in strips, scattered through the woods and dropped marked trees. Swampers were with them, clearing the way for teams that followed close on the sawyers' heels and drayed these high quality logs out to the railroad.

Ben Elliott was everywhere. Bird-Eye knew his specialty, he determined, and Ben let the little Irishman go it alone. Without help Blaine could find more veneer trees in a day than the crew could drop and get out to the decking grounds.

"But it's a man's sized job to keep your eye on such an operation!" Ben declared to Able. "I've got to watch Buller and the mill, too. I've got to think about markets so we'll be all set when we commence to saw again. And the devil of it is I'm only one hand and there are only twenty-four hours in a day!" He grinned. "Where's this good man you told me about? Jeffers? Is that his name?"

"Tim Jeffers? Over in the next town! But I doubt he'll even listen. He hasn't wanted a job in three years."

"Doubting isn't knowing," Ben said grimly and the next afternoon drove hard for Jeffers' little farm clearing.

The old logger met Elliott with an eye that seemed at first to be hostile but which on closer observation proved to be only one of severe appraisal.

"So you're after a camp foreman," he said. "No, I've quit the timber for good, Elliott. I'm through. A man has trouble enough without hunting it. I'm not a young man, son. I've no years nor strength any more to put into another man's losing fight."

"We won't lose. Brandon's tried everything up to and including fire and he hasn't got me licked yet. Come along with me, Tim Jeffers, and we'll run him into his hole!"

But the man was obdurate and Ben left him, chagrined and a bit angered at his failure.

"Brandon's got a crimp in the whole country," he muttered as he drove on toward camp. "And here I am, trying to do four men's work. Tough nut? I'll tell the world!"

In Tincup he drove to the express office to inquire for the new piston head for the locomotive which was due. He wanted to start loading his veneer logs and getting them out to the siding as rapidly as they came from the woods. He had signed a contract with the time for delivery specified and wanted to run no chance of delay.

But the repair part was not there.

"Got the bill of it," the station agent said. "But it hasn't shown up. Ought to be along tomorrow."

However, the next day did not bring the repairs and the driver of Ben's supply team reported the fact to him.

"And the agent, he wants to see you," the man added enigmatically.

"Didn't that piston head come yet?" Ben demanded angrily of the supply teamster after the man's next trip to town.

"I told you the agent wanted to see you."

The other's manner was doggedly mysterious and Elliott, without further questioning, harnessed and drove to Tincup.

The agent shook hands cordially and drew him inside the tiny ticket office. He spoke in a cautious tone, although they were alone.

"The messenger on the train says he put that engine part off for me the night the bill came through. It ain't here and I'm takin' a chance of losing my job just telling you even that much."

Ben frowned.

"What are you driving at? It's not here and you'll lose— You mean, the express company'll hold you responsible for an article lost out of the depot?"

"That don't worry me. The shipment came in and I never saw it and if I was to tell you that the only thing that could've happened was that it was taken off the truck while I was handling baggage it wouldn't be a bad guess. But if certain parties knew I told you that much the railroad would get such a complaint about me that I'd be out of a job between days and don't you forget it!"

"Oh, I see." Ben looked at a calendar. "It took them five days to get it back to me. Can't wait that long. Give me a telegraph blank. I'll have 'em notify me by wire when they ship and if I have to meet trains myself . . . why, I can do that, too."

The other nodded and gave Ben a worried look.

"I sort of liked the way you did up Duval in that log rollin'; and I heard about the trimmin' you gave him at camp. And I'm . . . Well, I've seen enough raw stuff go on around this man's town to feed me up. I'll help you all I can but I've got kids to think about."

Ben made a wry face.

"Even children don't seem safe," he said. "Some of us have got only our dander invested in the particular fracus I'm mixing in, but everything the little McManus girl has got is at stake."

"Yup. You're— Little girl?"

"Yes. The McManus girl. She owns the Hoot Owl."

"Oh," the agent said with a queer look.

The following morning, a half hour after the men had gone to the woods, a sawyer came running toward the camp office just in time to catch Ben before he left for the mill.

"Hi, Elliott!" he called. "Hold on a minute!"

He came breathlessly up to the sleigh.

"Somebody cut three inches offen the measures last night. Thought you ought to know. Logs three inches short might be thrown out."

"Somebody cut— How'd you find that out?"

"Well, we left the measuring stick layin' on a tree we'd dropped last night. I'd marked it myself, figurin' on making one more log before we quit and then we decided not to. It snowed just a mite durin' the night. I laid the measure down again this morning and made another mark, forgetting about the first which was covered up with snow, you see. When I marked, it knocked the snow off the log, showing up my first one three inches off. I thought that was funny so I measured again. Somethin' was wrong, sure. We looked her over and found where a piece had been cut off the stick and then we saw where tracks—"

"Be with you pronto," Ben muttered as he turned his team back toward the barn.

He found five of the saw gangs with shortened measures. Fortunately, the discovery was made early in the day and only a few under-length logs had been made. However, it proved to Ben that menacing influences struck in unexpected ways and from all quarters. An unexplained snowshoe trail was found which led in from the north and none knew who had made it. The visitor evidently had gone out by road in the dead of night.

"Seems to me," Bird-Eye said that night, "that I heard 'bout two fellys trappin' over ferninst Squaw lake. Moight be they ain't trappers a-tall, a-tall!"

Shortly after dinner on the following day Ben Elliott set out to investigate this story of a trappers' camp on Squaw lake, which lay to the northward of Hoot Owl.

Things were going swimmingly on the job. He was a bit ahead even of the stiff schedule of production he had set for himself and if the weather held reasonably good and he could frustrate these attempts to slow him up, he would turn the trick which engaged him for the present.

It was a good six miles to Squaw lake but he did not follow the most direct route. Swung right and left now and then, smiling when he came on a particularly fine piece of timber. Certainly, the Hoot Owl stuff looked better every time he went through it. Money standing on end for an orphan girl if he, Ben Elliott, should be strong enough to outlast Nicholas Brandon's ruthlessness and persistence! He wondered about Dawn McManus, known and marked as the daughter of a murderer. Tough, he told himself, for a child to grow up under a cloud like that.

He started back after a fruitless investigation, and had not gone more than half-way to camp when he came suddenly upon a fresh snowshoe trail. He stopped short with a little thrill. Another prowler? The one who had shortened his measures yesterday? The tracks were only moments old, he knew by the way the freshly falling snow lay in them.

He took the trail at a swift walk, came on a place where the one he followed had stopped and stood a moment, turned around and then resumed his way.

Ben went faster, breaking into a jog trot where the going was good. A half hour later he saw the moving figure before him. Ben saw him turn about, looking upward, stare into the wind which blew from the northwest and swing and go with it. Not completely lost, as a greenhorn might be; not floundering in panic and traveling meaningless circles. but still far from certain in directions.

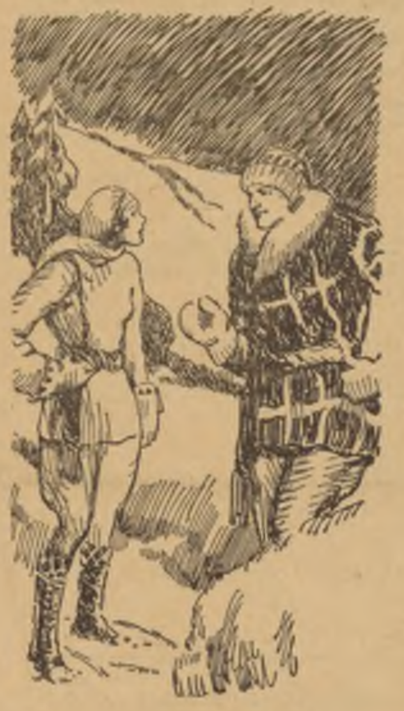
Ben felt a tightening in his throat. This, the chances were, would be an encounter with one of the men who, most certainly acting on Brandon's orders, sought to hamper and hamstring him. A savage anticipation ran his veins with that; to meet this prowler would be a greater satisfaction, even, than throwing Bull Duval out of his camp had been.

Elliott pushed on, moving faster than the other, cutting down the distance between them as the thickening gloom made it impossible for him to see clearly at any distance.

The man before him stopped suddenly and faced about. Elliott hesitated, wondering whether he had been seen or not. If not, he wanted to trail secretly; if so—

He had no doubt, now, that he had been seen, so he went forward resolutely, intent on meeting the wanderer with challenge.

He dipped into a sharp ravine, climbed the other slope . . . and came face to face with the most lovely girl he could then or afterward remember having seen in his life.



"Good Afternoon," She Said Brusquely.

Great brown eyes looked at him. The nose was small, aristocratic; the mouth red lipped, mobile, he imagined, but now it was set rather grimly into an expression of extreme petulance.

He did not register consciously the knitted toque of soft maroon wool, nor the well-tailored jumper and knickers. Impressions leaped at him in ensemble, rather than detail: a trim, trig, competent little figure.

"Oh!" he said, when she did not speak. "Oh . . . Why, hello!"

He grinned, then, but no responsive smile changed the girl's face or even lighted her eyes.

"Good afternoon," she said brusquely, almost sharply.

THE STORY FROM THE BEGINNING

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the lumbering town of Tincup, with Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. He defeats Bull Duval, "king of the river," and town bully, in a log-birling contest. Nicholas Brandon, the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence, trying to force him to leave town and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Elliott is arrested and finds a friend in Judge Able Armitage. The judge hires him to run the one lumber camp, the Hoot Owl, that Brandon has not been able to grab. This belongs to Dawn McManus, daughter of Brandon's old partner, who has disappeared with a murder charge hanging over his head. Brandon sends Duval to beat up Ben, and Ben worsts him in a fist fight and throws him out of camp. Don Stuart dies, leaving a letter for Elliott "to be used when the going becomes too tough." Ben refuses to open the letter, believing he can win the fight by his own efforts. Fire breaks out in the mill. Ben, leading the victorious fight against the flames that threatened to win the fight for Brandon, discovers the fire was started with gasoline.

Sparrow Hawk, Smallest, Family's Most Beautiful

During late fall and winter field and house mice form the main diet of the Sparrow Hawk, the smallest and most beautiful of our hawk family, according to a writer in the Missouri Farmer. Exceedingly brave and aggressive, it will sit in a nearby tree while the farmer shucks corn out of the shock or when he is hauling fodder out of the field, watching for mice which run out of the shock.

This hawk has an amazing sense of sight; with a graceful swoop, he catches a mouse on the run that is scurrying away from a corn shock, having seen his prey emerge from the shock from his vantage point many yards distant. His skill and his value to the farmer can best be noted when snow is on the ground; his food supply is then low and he is braver than usual. At such a time he will catch mice very near the farmer who is working at the corn shock.

Occasionally the sparrow hawk attacks small birds and chickens. These depredations usually occur during the nesting period or when other food is scarce, but these irregularities are so infrequent that they are more than outweighed by its good services in destroying mice and insects.

Foods Contain Water

All foods contain water. The dryest bread or biscuit may contain 5 to 10 per cent water, and some fruits and vegetables, like tomatoes, melons, lettuce, cauliflower and strawberries, may contain as much as 90 per cent.

MAN NOT ALWAYS HELD ENEMY BY WILD CREATURES

There was once a time of universal friendship, or at least mutual tolerance, between man and the animals, declares Dr. Walter Hough. curator of anthropology of the Smithsonian institution. This situation is contrary to the theory that in the early days there was mutual antagonism between man and the lower creatures, causing a "tooth and claw" relationship.

"There are still remnants of this original 'Eden' in isolated parts of the world," states Doctor Hough. who has been tracing the method by which man domesticated animals. The trail of most of the domesticated animals leads back to central Asia. There, Doctor Hough believes, early man had a temperament especially adapted to inspire friendship and confidence among his fellow creatures.

"Observers in new countries," Doctor Hough says, "have recorded with surprise the lack of fear by animals. . . . There still remain in remote parts zones of peace, where animals are unaccustomed to fear. One such zone was found in Tibet by naturalists of the British Mount Everest expedition. . . . Another instance was called to my attention by a member of our own staff, who observed the lack of fear among the animals during his exploration of St. Lawrence island, Alaska.

"The above leads to the generalization that domestication is not the province of cruel and fear-engendering men. Domestication came about in zones of peace and was accomplished by peaceful men through kindly methods. The coming together of such fortuitous circumstances as animals suited for domestication and men of the peaceful, patient type undoubtedly was found in Asia, where our domestic animals originated."

Horse Still Survives

In its first enthusiasm over the Machine age, the world prepared to say farewell to the horse. But horseflesh remains as hardy as ever and refuses to be shoved into oblivion. One of the predictions was the disappearance of the war horse, in favor of motor cars, trucks, tanks and motorized artillery batteries. Motorized artillery was given a thorough test by the United States army, and the verdict was that the horse could never be entirely displaced, for his superiority in rough country and over muddy roads was clear. The War department now has announced its plans for mechanization, and the horse gets ample recognition. Effective December 1, 41 artillery units will be motorized, but 33 horse-drawn batteries will be retained.

Big Figures for Relief

"What comes after a billion?" asked the girl who was copying statistics.

"Everybody," answered Senator Sorghum.

How Calotabs Help Nature To Throw Off a Bad Cold

Millions have found in Calotabs a most valuable aid in the treatment of colds. They take one or two tablets the first night and repeat the third or fifth night if needed.

How do Calotabs help Nature throw off a cold? First, Calotabs are one of the most thorough and dependable of all intestinal eliminants, thus cleansing the intestinal tract of the germ-laden mucus and toxines. Second, Calotabs are diuretic to the kidneys, promoting the elimination of cold poisons from the blood. Thus Calotabs serve the double purpose of a purgative and diuretic, both of which are needed in the treatment of colds.

Calotabs are quite economical; only twenty-five cents for the family package, ten cents for the trial package. (Adv.)

Birmingham Post Offers Cash Awards To Farmers

Owner Or Share-Cropper Showing Greatest Progress In 'Plant-To-Prosper Campaign' To Be Selected For Participation In Total Of $1450

Offer of a total of $1450 in cash prizes to Alabama farmers making the greatest progress in a live-at-home program in 1935 was announced this week by The Birmingham Post.

With the object of reducing the amount of food and feedstuffs imported into Alabama, now estimated to total nearly $145,000,000 a year, The Post is sponsoring a statewide competition to see which farmers make the greatest progress in intelligent diversification.

The campaign, The Post announces, is in co-operation with the Auburn Agricultural Extension Service and a group of Birmingham firms which believe the state's prosperity will be materially helped if farmers get into position to produce all the food and feedstuffs used in the state.

Every farmer, regardless of whether he cultivates his own land or works on shares, is eligible.

The Post is introducing a system to place all farmers on the same basis in competing for the awards. No farmer need feel because his farm or home is not to be compared with that of a more fortunate neighbor, that he is handicapped in the contest, as the judges will consider chiefly the relative progress made during the crop year.

County winners will be chosen by county committees which farm agents will be asked to head. District and state winners will be selected from county winners by a committee which Gov. Bibb Graves and R. J. Goode, commissioner of agriculture, will name.

Grand Prize Of $500

For the grand prize of $500 every farmer in the state is eligible to compete. In addition prizes of $450 are offered in each of three districts into which the state is divided by the Extension Service.

In addition to the cash prizes, the farmer adjudged the winner in each of the state's 67 counties will receive an invitation, along with his county agent, to come to Birmingham this fall for the first annual Plant-To-Prosper banquet. Each county winner will also receive a Certificate of Merit.

BASIS OF AWARD

The basis on which the award will be made follows:

Progress made in producing food and feed consumed on the farm, 60 points.

Progress made in soil improvement, 10 points.

Progress made in increasing comfort and healthfulness of the home, 10 points.

Progress made in improving livestock on farm, 10 points.

Sense of civic and community responsibility, 10 points.

The campaign will be carried on in co-operation with the county agents and with the help of county papers in each county.

RULES OF CONTEST

Here are the things expected of each farmer who enters the Plant-To-Prosper competition:

1. Fill out an entry blank and mail it to the Plant-To-Prosper Bureau in care of The Birmingham Post.

2. File with the county agent not later than June 1 a farm inventory sh[illegible] what was produced on the farm in 1934 and what the farmer has —land houses and all—on June 1, 1935.

3. On July 1, Aug. 1 and Sept. 1, give the county agent in accordance with his directions a brief summary of what has been produced each month on the farm.

4. On Oct. 1 give the county agent a complete list of what has been produced on the farm during the year, compared with the previous year, and showing to what extent food and feedstuffs produced and saved will make the farm self-sustaining for the coming year.

Fill out the accompanying entry blank today and mail it to The Plant-To-Prosper Bureau, Birmingham Post, Birmingham, Ala., and receive a leaflet containing additional information and pointers.

WOULD RISK LIVES TO ASSIST SCIENCE

Scores Offer Selves for Tests to Revive Dead

Berkeley, Calif.—Scores of men, women and young people of America are not afraid to risk their lives in the cause of scientific research, nor to give their lives should science fail.

Dr. Robert E. Cornish, young Berkeley scientist, who achieved world-wide fame in bringing back to life "Lazarus IV," a terrier experimentally put to death in a laboratory, revealed he has received such letters from nearly every state in the Union.

The offers began to deluge him shortly after he had attempted to gain permission from the governors of three western states to apply his resuscitation methods to a criminal immediately after his execution by gas.

Permission Refused.

Permission was refused by the governors. But if Doctor Cornish wishes a human body for experimentation he has only to pick and choose from names in a bulging letter file.

Amazing as these offers sound, sincerity shines from most of them.

From a medical man in California:

"If you wish a subject for experimentation, I will offer myself in any way you suggest for science."

From a man in the Bronx, New York:

"I have been reading in the papers about your dead dog. . . . I am willing to take the dog's place, to let you put me to death and bring me back to life again. If you fail it will be my hard luck."

Nothing to Lose.

From a West Virginia youth of twenty-two:

"I was wondering if you could use me to experiment with. I've got nothing to lose and there is nothing to hold me."

From a former wealthy society woman of California:

"If you can arrange to put in trust $5,000 for each of my children I will submit to your experiment. I've got to make good to my children."

From a girl in Brooklyn, N. Y.:

"I have always wanted to do something good for humanity. I will offer myself for your experiment, but I must be assured my mother will be cared for the rest of her life."

So went the letters—scores and scores of them. They are still coming. None of the offers have been accepted.

Teach Horses to Dance in Real Pony Ballet

Boston.—This town has recently become so enthusiastic about horses that now certain favored individuals of the equine species are being sent to dancing school. This, too, is being done without any thought of these nags graduating into a circus from the everyday canters of life.

In brief, 16 horses of the mounted patrol will do a "soft-shoe" dance for the edification of the police commissioner. The term is easily explained. These horses have been prancing and keeping time to music at the head of parades for years. "Why not teach them some regular waltzes?" asked Sergt. Edward B. Kane, in charge of the mounted division.

Training of these animals for the dance had not progressed far when it was discovered, quite accidentally, that horses dance better without shoes. All 16 members of this genuine "pony-ballet" will complete their dance drills without shoes, and thus qualify for all the intricacies of the art before putting on their show for the police commissioner.

Take Uncertainty Out of Weather Forecasting

Cambridge, Mass.—Uncertainty will be taken out of weather forecasting in the future through the use of radio-sounding balloons and other devices, Prof. Charles F. Brooks, director of the Blue Hill Meteorological observatory predicted. He said:

"By the end of the next fifty years I expect that radio sounding balloons will be sent up several times daily from a hundred stations in the United States and that our knowledge of the atmosphere will be so greatly increased that forecasts will no longer be so uncertain as 'unsettled, probably rain or snow.'"

Lights of New York

by L. L. STEVENSON

The night club is coming back into its own along Broadway. It isn't the night club of prohibition. Nor is it the cabaret of pre-prohibition. The stuffiness and handkerchief-sized dance floors of the prohibition era have changed to wide expanses and fresh air. The old "intimate" character of the night club thus has been destroyed. Few regret that, however, since the "intimate" part used to consist of jamming together, and used air. Furtiveness of course disappeared with repeal. Instead of lookouts, peek holes, and "I'm a friend of Joe's," or "ask for Tony," there are signs in big electric letters. The cry "Hello, sucker," is no longer heard. The night club addict may pay as much as he desires. But he knows what he is paying. Split pencils are not used in adding checks. Checks are printed on cash registers and the items may be compared with menus.

* * *

Many well known figures are missing from the new night club deal. Texas Guinan exists only in memory. The Larry Fay type has been weeded out. Night clubs, instead of being outlaws, are licensed and licenses being revocable, they obey the rules. Curfew rings at 4 a. m., except when there are such special dispensations as New Year's eve. For those, an all night license must be obtained. There are also rules that cover the conduct of employees. Gigolos are out. Female employees who take part in the shows can't dance or mingle with patrons. Only occasionally is there a battle. Usually it is ended so quickly many of the guests know nothing of it. The corps of plug uglies who used to work on patrons who objected to the size of checks are among the missing also.

The difference between the present day cabaret and the pre-prohibition edition is principally in the matter of clothing, or rather the lack of it. Torsos were not considered entertainment before Volstead, even if knees might have been. For a long time now, even before repeal, the feminine body has been on display in Broadway as well as along the beaches—only more of it. Little has been left to the imagination. Occasionally, reformers have voiced vehement objections to the displays of white flesh. Nothing happened. Now a new French enterprise goes even further and as this is being written, there has been no complaint.

As has been said, dancing in the prohibition days was largely a matter of toe treading. The size of the floors made for intimacy all right. Occasionally, they also made for battles. Nowadays, a lot of dancing is being done on stages—by patrons as well as paid performers, the patrons going on the stage when the chorines and others leave it. Some of the grills, where there are no stages, have dance floors as big as those in some ballrooms. Also instead of but one orchestra, there are two and even three, sometimes taking runs and sometimes cutting loose simultaneously—with the director leading with a flashlight.

* * *

Those consulted say that tips are not what they used to be. Hundred-dollar bills are no longer slipped into eager hands. Nowadays, the tuba player is not the envy of the gentleman with the piccolo because play boys use the instrument as a currency repository. But things are looking up. Five-dollar bills are not uncommon and there is even hope that tenners will soon be much in evidence.

* * *

A number of theatrical producers are not in favor of the new night club deal. Shows are given with dinners and, in many instances, are so timed that they do not end until long after curtain time in the theater. So there is some more competition about which to worry and about which, seemingly, nothing can be done.

Lots of Room Left for Human Race on Earth

Eugene, Ore.—The earth is a long way from over-population yet, according to Dr. Warren D. Smith, professor of geography and geology at the University of Oregon.

Doctor Smith says that science is now able to compute that the world would support some 5,500,000,000 people, more than twice as many as it now supports. The estimate of 2,024,286,000 is generally accepted as a fairly accurate total of the present population. The five billion figure is possible, however, he says, only with careful planning and development of resources.

Among other findings in Doctor Smith's recent survey are: That birth control and birth selection are imperative if a high plane of civilization is to be maintained; that the tropics are now the great goal of the whites; and that brunette whites will probably dominate the earth in time.

Nature's Sculpture

Virgin's Island, N. S.—A nearly perfect figure of the Madonna, with the Christ-Child in her arms, has been found etched on the face of a steep, barren rock here. The rock cannot be reached. The etching, believed made by nature itself, can be seen only on clear days from a distance.

Here's Luxury Liner That Nobody Wants

Paris.—Nobody wants the burned-out hulk of the 42,500-ton luxury liner L'Atlantique, although it is worth a large amount of money as "scrap."

Recently the Paris appeal court decided the underwriters were liable to the owners for the full insurance, $11,390,000.

The decision made the hulk the property of the underwriters, but they have no wish to become its owners.

If they do a bill for $3,330,000 awaits them from the French, Dutch and German salvage firms which towed the ship into Cherbourg.

Strange Waters Puzzle Fish From Caribbean

Atlantic City, N. J.—Slightly bewildered in the strange waters, a unique fish—peristedion imiatum—whose habitat is in the Caribbean sea, was caught off shore with little trouble.

Carroll B. Atkinson, a local ichthyologist, identified the fish. It had a weird appearance, seemingly to represent a cross between a modern armored tank and a fabled Chinese dragon. When it was captured the fish was colored blood red, but gradually lost its brilliant hues.

White Hen Pheasant Seen

Potatoes Replace Torpedoes on Sub

Amsterdam.—Potatoes and onions—not torpedoes—are stowed in the tubes of the Dutch submarine K-18 now on a 23,000-mile trip from Holland to Sourabaia, Java.

The trip will be the longest ever made by a submarine, and will take eight months.

When provisions were stored aboard the 707-ton craft at Neiuwediep, Holland, it was found that there wasn't enough room. The commander then decided it was better to leave two torpedoes at home, rather than bales of potatoes and onions.

Purest Helium Is Found in State of Colorado

Pueblo, Colo.—Purest helium in the world is found in Los Animas county in this state. Helium is a rare gas which is noncombustible and very buoyant, and is used in dirigibles. It is found only in the United States and, until recently, was produced only in Texas. Its export, because of its military importance, outside the country is forbidden.

"Nobody pays me much, because I work so cheap! That keeps me busy, and being busy is what I like best of all. I also enjoy getting letters like this one from Mr. C. O. Glass, of Ashland, Alabama, who says:

"In addition to lights, refrigeration and range I am using seven other appliances operated with electricity. Over a period of years my service has been entirely satisfactory, and instead of my bills being increased they have decreased appreciably. I am making this statement on a check up of actual costs and am more than pleased with services rendered; the services being satisfactorily and most efficiently rendered by the company and by your local representative."

A $2.00 Dinner for 6

ALL the way from tomato juice to demi-tasse with steak and shoe-string potatoes, buttered broccoli and bread and butter and a delicious dessert sandwiched in between — that's what this dinner, which will cost an average of a little more than thirty-three cents a person in most communities, offers. Here's the menu:

Iced Tomato Juice 17¢
Minute Steak 60¢
Shoe-String Potatoes 10¢
Buttered Broccoli 50¢
Apricot Cream Dessert 48¢
Bread and Butter 10¢
Demi-tasse 5¢

And here are the recipes for the dishes which are not familiar to everyone.

Iced Tomato Juice: Mix together the contents of two 12½-ounce cans tomato juice, salt and pepper to taste, two teaspoons sugar, a few drops Worcestershire sauce and a few drops tobasco sauce, and chili thoroughly.

Apricot Cream Dessert: Beat one cup cream, and add one-third cup confectioner's sugar, a few drops of almond flavoring and one-fourth cup chopped nuts. Break up four vanilla wafers and add, and put in the refrigerator tray for several hours. Scoop out onto dessert plates, and lay the drained apricots from a No. 2 can around the base.

If desired, a fruit cocktail can be substituted for the tomato juice. Use the syrup from the canned apricots, pep up with lemon juice and add a couple of diced bananas and a diced apple to make enough for six.*

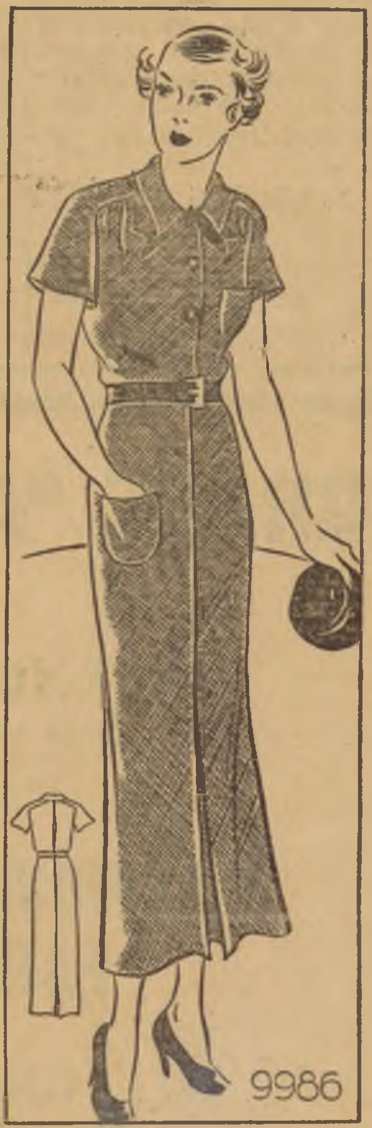
Extreme Chic in This Frock

PATTERN 9986



If you've been following the latest trend in style news, you know that the classic shirtwaist frock is still one of Fashion's pets. And here's a delightful version of it. The sleeves and shoulders are cut in one to give a nice smooth line, and make them easy as a, b, c to fit. The bodice with a trim slot-pleat at the back to match the chic of its buttoned front closing is smartly gathered to the yoke—the long skirt seams end in jaunty inverted pleats—and the patch pockets follow the latest mode by being rounded instead of square. Make it of a rough crepe and put an impudent little contrasting bow at the throat for added chic!

Pattern 9986 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40. Size 16 requires 3½ yards 39 inch fabric.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE of each pattern.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern department, 232 West Eighteenth street, New York.

Frenchmen who pride themselves on their capacity for food enjoyed themselves at the three-day banquet held in connection with the annual Stomach festival at Rouen. The best and rarest dishes of Normandy were served at the three-day meal.

WHEN YOU TAKE A LAXATIVE

. . . use a spoon

It isn't what brand of laxative you take that's so important—it's the form. A liquid laxative can be taken in any required amount. If only a little is needed, you need never take a bit too much.

Doctors favor the easily measured liquid laxatives. Instead of any form that does not encourage variation from the fixed dose. A fixed dose may be an overdose for you—or your child.

Always remember this one thing about constipation: the secret of any real relief is reduced dosage.

Give the bowels only as much help as may be needed, and less help as the need grows less. You will find Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin an excellent aid in regulating the bowels. It contains senna and cascara (natural laxatives) and it will clear-up any bilious, sluggish condition without upset. Delightful taste, and pleasant action. Your druggist has it.

WATCH YOUR KIDNEYS!

Be Sure They Properly Cleanse the Blood

YOUR kidneys are constantly filtering impurities from the blood stream. But kidneys get functionally disturbed—lag in their work—fail to remove the poisonous body wastes.

Then you may suffer nagging backache, attacks of dizziness, burning, scanty or too frequent urination, getting up at night, swollen feet and ankles, rheumatic pains; feel "all worn out."

Don't delay! For the quicker you get rid of these poisons, the better your chances of good health.

Use Doan's Pills. Doan's are for the kidneys only. They tend to promote normal functioning of the kidneys; should help them pass off the irritating poisons. Doan's are recommended by users the country over. Get them from any druggist.

Pleasant News
Air Fleet Controls
Nordic Max, Jewish Max
Gen. Dawes Sees Joy

It is pleasant to read a Washington dispatch saying that the government will establish a great airport in Hawaii near Fort Kamehameha, named for the last king of Hawaii. The idea is to keep enough bombing planes there to take care of unwelcome flyers or surface ships arriving from Asia.

Arthur Brisbane

It will be more pleasant to read, as you may do later, that the government plans to establish a powerful air base on the island of Guam, which we are free to fortify, now that the Washington conference agreements have been repudiated and our silly pledge not to fortify Guam is wiped out.

Thanks to airplanes, the Greek rebellion is crushed. The old Greek patriot, Venizelos, leading the revolt at the age of seventy-two, fled from his home on the Island of Crete across the Aegean sea to an Italian island for refuge.

Weeping, the old man vowed that he would never again set foot on Greek soil. A rebel cruiser took Venizelos to the protection of the Italian flag. Then, last of the fleet that had rebelled, the cruiser Averoff surrendered to the government.

Max Schmeling, German heavyweight prize fighter, beat Mr. Hamas with ease and says, "Now we get Baer." Baer, you know, is the world's heavyweight champion. The fact that he is a Jew, and not a blue-eyed Nordic, with the back of his head as straight up and down as a board fence, is said to annoy Mr. Hitler.

It will interest Hitler and others. A hard-hitting "Nordic" meets Max Baer, a tall young Jew, who laughs while he fights. The meeting will settle nothing. Racial supremacy does not depend on the fist. But in New York city it ought to draw a crowd, gigantic, and a "gate" of about one million dollars.

General Dawes, once Vice President, always busy, now visiting General Pershing at Tucson, Ariz., says: "America is on the verge of real economic recovery. Its natural force, and human nature, are definitely working for recovery, and in May of this year, positively not later than July, the nation will know the depression is over." Well, it is a pleasure to have somebody at least say so, even though they may have to say it over and over year after year.

The California assembly votes 58 to 17 in favor of the Townsend plan. The state senate, however, revolted and defeated the resolution calling on congress to enact the old age pension bill. It is not possible for the United States to pay twenty-four thousand million dollars every year, the total cost of giving $200 per month to every man past sixty.

It does not cost the assemblyman anything to vote for the impossible, and it makes him feel politically safe.

H. G. Wells is in America to write about the New Deal. He will find some good applicable descriptive copy in his book, written long ago, "Doctor Moreau's Island."

Doctor Moreau performs some strange and horribly cruel operations in the effort to make animals speak and otherwise act like human beings.

Mr. Wells will find the new era performing strange operations on business men, to make them speak the new business language.

New Yorkers are told that all workers pay in taxes in various ways the earnings of one day every week. The man who has $5,000 a year pays $1,000 toward the support of government. Some men with bigger incomes, busy just now borrowing money with which to pay taxes, could tell a more interesting story.

When watches were first made a Frenchman said it was strange that man, with genius and intelligence enough to make a watch, should be superstitious enough to believe in ghosts. It's more strange that the human race with sufficient intellect and will to fly, travel underneath the ocean, and talk around the world, without wires, should be feeble and foolish enough to believe in a permanent depression. The belief in ghosts is slowly disappearing. Let's hope and believe the depression will disappear more rapidly.

The national ladies' hairdressers' convention, gathered in Toronto, is informed that platinum blonds are on the wane and red-haired women, politely called "titian," are rising in favor. The platinum blond is a modern invention, a passing thing, whereas the woman with red hair antedates all the governments and civilization that we know, and may outlast them.

Fine Fruit Candies

IS there anyone anywhere who doesn't prick up his ears at the words homemade candies, especially when they are made from pure sweet fruit? Children love them, because they are so good, mothers approve of them because they are wholesome. As for fathers—they like them because it is the best candy they've tasted since the old maple sugar days down on the farm.

Peach Jelly Cubes: Press an eight-ounce can of peaches through a sieve, making a purée. Add one-half cup pectin syrup (made according to directions on bottle), one-half cup sugar, one-half cup corn syrup, and one tablespoon lemon juice. Boil until thermometer registers 222 degrees. Pour into greased pans so that mixture is about one-half inch thick and let cool. Let stand over night in a cold place. Cut in cubes and roll in powdered sugar. May also be dipped in chocolate or in melted fondant.

This Is Divine

Pineapple Divinity: Cook one-half cup shredded pineapple and three tablespoons sugar to a thick jam, 225 degrees. Mix two cups sugar, one-half cup water, and one-eighth teaspoon cream of tartar, and boil to 260 degrees. Just before this temperature is attained, add the pineapple jam, continuing the boiling to the 260-degree point. Beat one egg-white stiff, then add hot syrup very slowly, stirring constantly, and beating till stiff and will hold its shape. Add one-fourth cup chopped maraschino cherries, and pour into buttered pans.*

NEW YORKERS MOVE TO ESCAPE TAXES

Many Prominent Families Migrate to Rhode Island.

New York.—Faced with the prospect of increased state taxation, some of New York's wealthiest and most prominent families are reported to be migrating to Rhode Island, which has no state income tax and a comparatively low personal property tax.

The exodus was said to have been given impetus when Gov. Herbert H. Lehman announced a proposed tax levy of 7 per cent on income exceeding $9,000. Since Rhode Island asks only $4 on $1,000 of personal property, families which have been in New York for as long as 300 years have prepared to establish residence in the New England state.

Among those who have moved to Rhode Island—some already had summer estates there—are Mr. and Mrs. Harold A. Sands, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Goelet, Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon Whitehouse, Mr. and Mrs. Forsythe Wickes, Mr. and Mrs. Beverly Bogert, Mrs. Morris De Pyster and Mr. and Mrs. William Henry Williams. Most of them declined, when questioned, to say why they moved.

The Sands family has been among the foremost in New York since before 1820, while more than a century ago the foundation of the immense Goelet fortune was laid here. Bogert is a New York banker. Whitehouse is descended from the family which came to New York before 1600. Williams is a railroad official and Wickes an attorney.

The migration first was noticed last election day, when several social figures went up to Newport to vote for the first time there.

England to Hold Royal Jubilee Celebrations

London.—Visitors to London this year should time their holidays for May or June, for in those months not only is the season at its height, but England will be gay with royal jubilee celebrations.

May 6, the twenty fifth anniversary of King George's accession to the throne, a chain of beacon fires will illuminate the length and breadth of the country.

Because of the jubilee celebrations in May, the first two courts of the season will take place in March, while the third and fourth courts will be held as usual in June. In June also will be the Derby and Ascot race meetings; the Wimbledon lawn tennis championships; the international horse show; the Aldershot Tattoo and the Hendon air pageant, which the king hopes to attend in person this year.

In May there will be the naval and military tournament at Olympia; the opening of the Royal academy summer exhibition, and jubilee celebrations in every district. During both months there will be a number of big charity balls.

"Hot" Grapefruit Rival of "Hot" Oil in Texas

Mercedes, Texas.--"Hot" grapefruit may soon be as great a problem to Texans as "hot" oil.

R. V. O. Swarthout, Texas citrus co-ordinator, has put into effect a proration order limiting shipments of grapefruit from this state. The order was authorized by the Texas Citrus committee, and is designed to prevent speculation in grapefruit in produce centers and to create a uniform price during the entire season.

Certificates have been issued to growers in the Rio Grande valley, and as is the case with oil, producers must receive a "tender" before they can ship their fruit.

Penalties for violation of the proration orders are so heavy that it is believed there will not be much "hot" grapefruit running.

Biologist Makes 5 Year Study of Fish in Texas

Houston, Texas.—Albert Collier, biologist at Rice institute, has completed a five-year study of salt and fresh water fish in this region. His survey revealed more than 100 salt water and 25 fresh water species. The red fish family, with includes the croaker, drum, sand trout, spotted trout, and the spot fish, is the largest of the salt water variety, while the bass species are the most prevalent of fresh water

Non-Freezing Lake Gives Farmer Idea

Geneva, N. Y.—Farmer Dell had a great idea.

The farmer's inspiration came from a peculiarity of Seneca lake, one of the state's most famous beauty spots.

The lake seldom freezes, despite the fact that surrounding waters are sheets of ice. Only in the most severe cold spells will the lake develop more than skim ice.

Farmer Dell's idea, as he later admitted, was to fill the radiator of his automobile with Lake Seneca water, and save the cost of purchasing non-freezing agents.

To his surprise, the water which would not freeze in Lake Seneca turned to ice so quickly during a zero cold wave that the radiator burst in several places.

Locals Smash Siluria Hi 17-3

The Montevallo High School Baseball team singled, doubled, bunted and home runned their way to a 17 to 3 win over Siluria High School Tuesday afternoon at the Montevallo High School field.

High points in the game were the two home runs knocked, Travis Hartley and Gail Morrison each clouting for the circuit. Several other members of the nine hit for singles and doubles.

The Siluria outfit seemed good enough in fielding what balls came to them to be handled, but was weak in the pitching department, several men being walked and numerous clean hits clipped out.

Hartley and Eiland were the batteries for Montevallo with Coach Hicks giving Joe Woods an opportunity to hurl later in the game.

Coyotes Reported Invading State

Montgomery, Ala. — The U. S. Department of Agriculture reports to the State Game and Fisheries Department that coyote, "wild dog of the western plains," is moving east and that Alabama is one of the states being invaded.

Tourists in the west often purchase coyotes puppies and bring them east, the report states, but in addition to the artificial plantings, the animals are said to be pushing eastward of their own accord.

At various intervals coyotes have been reported in Barbour, Marengo and Autauga counties and some were reported sighted several years ago in the Cherokee Bluff section of the state.

Home to the coyote is where ever he digs his den. He migrates easily and multiplies rapidly. Although coyotes are scavengers and, in addition, destroy many rodents, they are all too likely to find it easier to obtain their living by killing poultry and young pigs lambs and even calves.

The paid-hunter system is advocated by the Boilogical Survey as the best method of keeping coyotes under control, while some of the western states have been very successful in trapping them.

Plans Made For Legion Convention

Mobile, Ala. — Lamar Y. McLeod Post No. 3, American Legion, is making plans and preparations for the state department convention July 14 to 17, inclusive. This will be the third state convention of the organization of which Mobile will have been the host and the Legionaires of the coast city have learned what their visiting buddies like in the way of entertainment, and how to provide it.

One thing that Mobile's guests in the past years have enjoyed will look forward to is contact with salt water. During the coming convention they will be given an all-day trip to the Gul fof Mexico aboard a sea going vessel and an opportunity to swim in green water, eat seafood and acquire a regulated amount of sunburn; not too much for health and comfort.

Following registration on Sunday, July 14, Memorial exercises will be made impressive with services, addresses and good music. The remainder of the four days will be crowded with convention work and play in proper proportion. Committees are working out the details, which will be given out through the Alabama Legionaireand the state press as they are perfected.

Ladies of the Auxiliary are making equal preparation for the special entertainment of visiting ladies during the one stag event of the pogram, which will be the trip to a Gulf beach where bathing suits will not be provided.

Mackerel fishing is at its best at that season of the year and, as heretofore, many of the visitors are expected to remain for the week-end for the trolling.

Chancellor Hitler's Defiance of Treaty Provisions Alarms Europe; Drouth Threat Causes Wallace to Lift Restrictions on Spring Wheat Planting.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.

Chancellor Hitler

GERMANY, having recently boldly announced that she was now possessed of a military air force in violation of the Treaty of Versailles, still more boldly declares she is no longer bound by the obligations of that pact and proposes to build up an army of about 480,000 men, comprising 12 corps of three divisions each. This was the decision of the cabinet, which decreed compulsory military training throughout the reich. The exact number of men in the army will be determined by a law to be enacted later.

This was Chancellor Hitler's reply to the action of France's chamber of deputies in accepting Premier Flandin's plan to increase the term of conscript service in the French army to 18 months and subsequently to two years. Germany considered that France was "dealing the last blow to disarmament," and Hitler, rushing to Berlin from Berchtesgaden, directed the action of the cabinet and issued to the German nation a rousing appeal for full support. He declared that the failure of other nations to reduce armament as called for in the Versailles treaty had released Germany from all treaty obligations, and that while the reich had only peaceful intentions, it must re-arm to protect its territorial integrity and maintain the respect of the world as a coguarantor of European peace.

France is in no mood to take Hitler's defiance "lying down." An appeal was sent to the League of Nations to convoke an extraordinary council to deal with Germany's violation of the Versailles pact. The note hinted at the possibilities of economic sanctions (penalties) against Germany which might result in a boycott. An attempt is being made to force Britain into an alliance with France, and the mission of Sir John Simon, British foreign minister, to bring Germany back into the comity of European nations is regarded as seriously compromised. France and Italy insist that Simon go to Berlin as spokesman of the three powers, and not as the representative of Britain alone. Premier Mussolini is said to be backing France, and is alleged to be the prime power in a scheme to revive the pre-war policy of encircling Germany with a ring of steel.

President Roosevelt expressed his hope that his "good neighbor" policy might be extended to Europe as a basis for peaceful settlement of the tense situation. Just how the President expects to prevail upon those traditional enemies to become "good neighbors" was not fully explained. He declined to say whether this government will send a note to Germany protesting abrogation of military provisions of the separate treaty with this country. Although the United States is not a signatory to the Versailles pact, the separate peace treaty negotiated with Germany includes the military phases of the Versailles treaty. Many people in this country feel that United States intervention in the European dispute is neither necessary nor advisable.

GOV. MARTIN L. DAVEY of Ohio, charged by Federal Relief Administrator Harry L. Hopkins with "corruption" in Ohio relief, went before the state senate and demanded a thorough investigation. He defied Hopkins to come to Ohio for trial on a warrant he had secured charging Hopkins with criminal libel. Hopkins had alleged in a letter that he has proof of "corruption" of relief administration in Ohio including soliciting of funds for campaign purposes from firms that sold relief materials. Hopkins, through C. C. Stillman, FERA regional officer, has taken over administration of Ohio relief. Department of Justice attorneys in Washington declare they stand ready to defend Hopkins, but there was no indication that Hopkins would go to Ohio, although he may change his mind. The spectacular blowup is said to have had its inception in the 1934 political campaign. Davey made campaign speeches charging that Ohio relief was mismanaged, and particularly aimed his barbs at Cleveland. This irked Cleveland leaders since relief there had been administered through a non-political group, which later became the official Cuyahoga county relief administration. Hopkins often took note of the fact that Cleveland's relief committee was "one of the best in the country." Later Davey pledged himself not to touch the Cleveland organization, but is said to have ousted several members, and repeated old charges. Cleveland leaders took the fight to Washington.

Ohio Democrats stand firmly behind Davey. The Democratic delegation in the Ohio legislature appealed to President Roosevelt "to right the wrong which has been done our governor" and Francis W. Poulson, Democratic state chairman, summoned to appear before the grand jury, delivered a scathing attack on Hopkins. Poulson charged that Republicans in high government offices "have betrayed the President," and named Hopkins as "one who could be expected to tear down the Democratic party."

CLARENCE DARROW, foe of NRA, and author of the famous report which attacked NRA more than a year ago, assailed the administration's economic theories, including the national recovery act, in his testimony before the senate finance committee. The famous lawyer whose sharp speech and fiery courtroom tactics have made him famous, denounced NRA as playing into the hands of big business to the destruction of the "little fellow." He argued that NRA attacked the problem from the wrong angle and that the real trouble lay in faulty distribution, thus assailing the theory of scarcity. Darrow swept aside statements that NRA had helped organized labor, reduced unemployment and abolished child labor, with an assertion that it would have happened anyway. "The panic put an end to child labor," he said. "There wasn't any room for it while fathers and mothers were out of work."

"There is no question that small business has suffered under the NRA," Darrow continued. "It has suffered more than it would have suffered otherwise."

The suffering due to continued concentration of wealth would have gone on anyhow, he said, but added that NRA accelerated it.

"I am not an optimist," he added. "I may be an idiot, but not a cheerful idiot."

Sec'y Wallace

RESTRICTIONS on planting spring wheat have been removed by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, who fears the effect of another widespread drouth. The year's first crop report showing that farmers intend to plant 17,847,000 acres of spring wheat is said to be responsible for Wallace's about face. Last year the acreage was 18,521,000 acres. The administration is convinced that the government and farmers have a duty to protect consumers against a wheat shortage, he said. Farmers will plan an additional 900,000 to 2,300,000 acres as a result of the new order, and will harvest between ten and thirty million bushels more, Wallace estimates. Spring wheat normally constitutes about one-fourth of the nation's crop. He denied that the European situation pointing to a possibility of increased sales had anything to do with the new decision. Farmers under contract who plant their full spring wheat acreage will receive full benefit payments, but in return will be required to agree to reduce production in 1936 by the amount asked in next year's contract plus the amount they would have reduced this year. There is no indication that the corn acreage control program for 1935 will be altered.

PLANS to reduce American money to a single class—possibly federal reserve notes—are being considered by the administration, thus simplifying the nation's monetary structure and making it easier to control. Before this could be established it is necessary to make widespread changes in existing laws, and this will undoubtedly be undertaken when more immediate stages of the recovery drive are completed. According to a high government official, one class of money must be established in order that the government may effectively control issuance of money. Under this plan treasury notes and United States notes would be retired. The silver certificates backed by bullion now held in the treasury might be withdrawn from circulation and transferred to the federal reserve banks as was done with the gold certificates. Since the reserve banks would be sole holder of gold and silver certificates, a definite ratio of silver certificates could thus be established.

DONALD R. RICHBERG was named by the President to head a reorganized NRA board, taking the place of S. Clay Williams, resigned. At the same time the President increased the group governing the Blue Eagle agency from five to seven. A White House statement emphasized the change was made to accelerate the drive to push extension of the NRA through congress.

BY A vote of 202 to 191, the house voted to substitute the Patman currency expansion bill for payment of the soldiers' bonus for the "sound money" plan of Representative Vinson. A boisterous house thus defied President Roosevelt's warning that he will veto immediate payment of the adjusted compensation certificates. The administration is counting on the senate sustaining the veto.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT is looking ahead to 1936. Authoritative word has reached the Capital that he wants all controversial administration legislation cleared away at this session, so that congress can meet for a short and harmonious session prior to the 1936 Presidential campaign. Besides the relief bill, Mr. Roosevelt is said to be specially anxious to have congress pass his social security program; utility holding company legislation; a bill continuing NRA for two years; transportation regulation co-ordination; banking legislation; ship subsidy and increase in the capital of the Home Owners Loan corporation. If this can be cleared from the calendar, it may prevent any serious party squabbles that might interfere with plans to bring about Roosevelt's reelection. The White House is seriously concerned over rumors that congress may scrap a good part of the administration's controversial legislation.

Premier Mussolini

MUSSOLINI'S answer to the latest note on the Abyssinian situation postpones approval of the proposal that differences be decided by an international commission on conciliations "at least until the futility of direct negotiations has been proved." Il Duce made a counterproposal suggesting that the Italian minister to Abyssinia and the Ethiopian foreign minister get together for a series of personal conferences, go over all the data, and attempt to settle the dispute without the necessity of conciliation under the direction of the League of Nations. Direct negotiations are said to have the approval of both the French and British SPRING arrived in the West with a stifling dust storm which shrouded the country from eastern New Mexico to the Great Lakes. Powdered soil whipped up from the drouth-scourged prairies hid the sun, and beat relentlessly upon the senses. A dozen deaths were reported, due to suffocations, dust-induced pneumonia and traffic accidents. Freight trains were rolled to sidings, and passenger trains crept along on slow orders. Schools were closed in a number of communities in western states. Wheat prices jumped from 2 to 3¼ cents a bushel as winds cut into the dry Southwest, and Governor Landon of Kansas appealed to President Roosevelt for aid.

THE government is ready to sell gold to foreign nations that can offer an attractive proposition, Secretary Morgenthau announces. Recent sales to the Bank of Mexico and to Guatemala, Morgenthau points out, have cleared the way to similar negotiations with other countries, although he emphasized that no other transactions are being considered at this time. No conditions were attached to the transactions already consummated. In the dealings with Mexico virtually all her silver sales have been made to this country.

"We've got all the gold we can possibly use," Morgenthau added, indicating that the government would make no further undue efforts to accumulate the metal.

COMPROMISE and White House pressure brought about the defeat of the McCarran "prevailing wage" amendment to the work relief bill in the senate, and administration leaders were confident that the measure would be laid before the President for signature within a few days. The deadlock over the amendment was broken when Senator Richard B. Russell, Jr., of Georgia proposed a substitute which leaves the President free to pay "security wages," officially estimated at $50 a month, provided they do not adversely affect the wage scale in private industry; and providing that the prevailing wage must be paid on all permanent federal building projects. This way out, which had been approved by the White House, was accepted by the senate by a vote of 83 to 2, after the McCarran amendment had been defeated, 50 to 38. The two votes against the compromise were cast by Metcalfe of Rhode Island and Hale of Maine, both Republicans. Before the vote on the McCarran amendment was taken Senator Glass announced he was authorized to say that if it prevailed President Roosevelt would veto the measure.

Senate action finally developed into a race to pass the measure before Huey Long returned from Louisiana. Administration forces defeated three attempts to slash the bill, and overrode protests of old line Democrats that the bill imperils the nation's credit. Senator Glass, chairman of the appropriations committee in charge of the bill, solemnly asserted:

"I stand on my prediction that this tremendous appropriation will impair the credit of the United States."

Senator Tydings of Maryland described the bill as the "grandest pork barrel ever to come before congress."

WILEY POST'S second attempt to fly from Los Angeles to New York through the stratosphere in record-breaking time ended at Cleveland, where he was compelled to come down because his supply of oxygen was running short. He said he would have "passed out" in a few minutes if he had not descended to breathable air. Post is convinced that only this trouble prevented his making the transcontinental flight in seven hours and 40 minutes, and he declared he would soon try again. His unofficial average speed to the Cleveland airport was 279.46 miles an hour.

Chemists Seek Means of Slowing Down Oxidation

Oxygen, which gives us life, is also man's greatest industrial enemy, notes a writer in the Montreal Herald. The air we breathe contains one-fifth oxygen, and this gas is a highly corrosive substance. When a house burns down it is simply combining with the oxygen in the air. When soap turns brown on a chemist's shelf it is merely another instance of the corrosive quality of oxygen. But it is the motor industry that suffers most from the ravages of oxidation. Its two chief organic essentials, rubber and petrol, are especially susceptible. Thousands of pounds worth of these materials have been utterly wasted owing to the action of air—and now the scientists have struck back. They have been experimenting with the development of substances known as anti-oxidants These compounds when mixed with any product, slow down oxidation to such an extent that its usefulness and life are increased tenfold.

The "liquid test"

...it ENDS bowel worries for many people

This is a test that tells you whether the system needs a cathartic change. If you have constant sluggish spells or bilious attacks, and laxatives seem to make things worse, it would be wise to try this:

Stop all use of any laxative that does not encourage variation from a "fixed dose" (which may be entirely too large a dose for your individual need). Use instead, a liquid laxative that you can measure and regulate as to dose. As necessary to repeat, take smaller doses, less and less often, until the bowels are moving without any help at all.

Doctors use liquid laxatives, and a properly prepared liquid laxative, containing natural laxative agents like senna and cascara is a joy and a comfort; a real help in establishing regularity. Ask your doctor about this! (Doctors use liquid laxatives.) You can get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which is a most dependable liquid laxative, at any drug store.

The Man From Yonder

THE STORY FROM THE BEGINNING

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the lumbering town of Tincup, with Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. He defeats Bull Duval, "king of the river," and town bully, in a log-birling contest. Nicholas Brandon, the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence, trying to force him to leave town and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Elliott is arrested and finds a friend in Judge Able Armitage. The judge hires him to run the one lumber camp, the Hoot Owl, that Brandon has not been able to grab. This belongs to Dawn McManus, daughter of Brandon's old partner, who has disappeared with a murder charge hanging over his head. Brandon sends Duval to beat up Ben. and Ben worsts him in a fist fight and throws him out of camp. Don Stuart dies, leaving a letter for Elliott "to be used when the going becomes too tough." Ben refuses to open the letter, believing he can win the fight by his own efforts. Fire breaks out in the mill. Ben, leading the victorious fight against the flames that threatened to win the fight for Brandon, discovers the fire was started with gasoline. Elliott gets an offer of spot cash for logs, that will provide money to tide him over. But a definite time limit is set.

—9—

"I saw your trail. That is, I . . ." How different, this beginning, from the manner of address he had planned! He felt called upon, now, to explain his presence on her trail rather than to demand a reason for her being there. "I saw your trail," he began again, "and I thought . . . It seemed to me you might be a little lost."

"As a matter of fact, I am completely turned around," she said. "It was silly of me to come into the woods, especially on a day like this, without a compass. But I did . . . and here I am!" She was eyeing him closely, now, as though searching for some special detail of face or figure.

Lost! He thought: a lost Diana!

"I kept losing my bearings and had trouble getting oriented and am getting a little tired. It was so silly! Downright stupid! If you know this country you can set me right. I should be back in Tincup before long or they'll worry."

Ben wondered quickly and irrelevantly, who They might be. Yes, he could get her out. In a half hour he could have her in his camp and send her on her way to town. . . . But in a half hour . . . And with her manner so clearly hostile for no reason at all? . . . She impressed him as a young woman most desirable to know well and also as one whose confidence would be slow in acquiring.

"Lost, eh?" he asked and laughed oddly. "Matter of fact, I came out without a compass myself." That was truth. He needed no compass for a short swing such as he had made today; his sound woodsman's instinct would hold him safe.

"Well, that complicates matters," the girl said drily. "I've got to get out of this timber and I'm not good for much more travel in this sort of going. I haven't been on webs in several years and I've gone further than I should have."

"By George, that's too bad!" he said and hoped that none of his men, who would be trekking into camp by now, would shout or sing so their voices would break down the illusion of empty distances surrounding them which evidently possessed the girl. "Too bad! It's getting dark sure enough but it isn't very late. If you could sit down and get your wind, now—"

"But what good will that do? If we stay here until it's really dark there may be no getting out until morning. All I have with me is a cake of chocolate and the prospect of a hungry, cold night in the woods with you isn't alluring."

Ben rubbed his chin.

"I'm sorry. If the impression I make is as bad as—"

"I meant nothing personal. But I don't know you. I don't fancy being lost with anyone, let alone a stranger."

He thought she almost smiled, as if relenting a bit from her brusqueness.

"Look!" he said, pointing aloft to where a break in the clouds near the zenith let about the last of the daylight through. "It's going to clear. We'll have stars directly. Let me build a little shelter and a fire here. A few minutes of rest will do a lot of good and with stars we can get anywhere."

She hesitated, seeming to consider.

"All right, I must admit the last half hour's going has been hard."

Out came his belt ax, off went the lower limbs of young hemlocks. In less than it would take an ordinary man to lop the branches he had a bench of trampled snow on a knoll covered with aromatic boughs and a thick windbreak of them behind it. Then, attacking a huge birch stub he peeled off a quantity of lose bark. This he lighted from a match carried in a tightly corked bottle and as the quickly burning stuff shed a comfortable glow on the bower he had built, he knocked dead branches from a hemlock, fed them to the flame and then turned to a nearby dry top of a fallen maple, knocking off substantial faggots.

By the time he finished this the girl had shaken off her snowshoes, stuck them on end in the snow and was sitting on the couch he had built for her.

She eyed the fire as he stood erect, drawing off his gloves and spreading his big hands to the warmth.

"Strange," she said, "that you should be lost. From the way you make yourself comfortable in the woods I'd say you'd been born in timber."

"From the way you know woodcraft when you see it, I'd say it's as strange that you should be lost!"

"What I know of the woods was learned years ago. One gets rusty, I've discovered. Who are you and what are you doing here?"

Her directness quite took his breath.

"Well, my name's Ben Elliott, if that means anything to you. And I was looking for somebody who has no business to be here. Who are you and what brings you into this timber?"

He was bound, now, to break through her aloofness.

"That," she replied, however, "is largely my own affair. But, Mr. Elliott, if you should guess that I was simply trying to lose a certain unpleasant mood in the woods where I once was quite happy, you wouldn't be far from right."

She spoke incisively and unhesitatingly but it seemed to him that behind this brusquesness was something quite different; something he could not fathom. He was about to remind her that she had not yet revealed her identity when she went on:

"Looking for someone who has no business here, you said. Just who are they, what are they doing?"

"As to the first, I can't tell you. For the second, their purpose probably would be to attempt to hold up a timber operation in which I'm rather interested not so far from here."

Her eyes were on him with a curious expression, which might possibly have been personal interest.

"To hold you up? How?"

"Are you from Tincup?"

"I am."

"You know people there? And what seems to be the town's most famous tradition?"

"I don't understand."

"Isn't it that Nicholas Brandon finishes what he starts out to do? That whatever he says goes, come what may?"

Her eyes dropped.

"I've heard that said. People like to talk."

"Right! But I'm managing an outfit that's encouraging rough going from some source. All sorts of things are happening and I'm trying to head off certain of them."

"I see."

She looked away and puckered her delectable lips as though to whistle. Ben rubbed his chin again. She was not even interested in learning more about him, but where many young men would have been piqued at that he only laughed softly.

"What's the joke?" she asked, almost defiantly.

"I was just thinking that it's a funny situation when a man gets into a scrap and it looks so big to him that he thinks the whole darned country must be watching it and him; and then along comes a nice girl who's been in a position to hear all about it and who isn't interested a dime's worth."

She looked up at him slowly.

"You mean that you want to talk about it?"

"Perfectly natural that I should. I'm in one whale of a fight and having the time of my life. It's the first job I've found in a coon's age that was hard enough and complicated enough to be worth working over."

"That's what I've heard about you."

"You've . . . Oh, so you have heard about me?"

"Of course, I live in Tincup. Few have any secrets in a town of Tincup's size."

Ben chuckled again.

"Well, then, if you've heard that much about me and my job, maybe there isn't anything I could tell you that would be interesting."

"Maybe not," she said with an air of dismissal.

Ben watched her closely as she slowly broke a twig to bits with her slim fingers.

"Deer used to yard in the swamp back of here," she said. "When I was a little girl I used to come out and try to make friends with them. That's why I came out today . . . wondering if they'd started to yard yet."

"It's too early for them to yard."

"Yes, but the snow may get deep enough any day to bunch them."

"Snow!" he said and shrugged. "If it gets deep in a hurry the deer will yard all right and, maybe, I'll be licked and a little girl done out of all she has in the world."

"All she has in the world? Meaning just what?"

"If you live in Tincup and know the town you must know about the owner of this property. This is the Hoot Owl timber."

A queer smile twitched at the girl's lips.

'Sometimes I think I do; as often, I wonder what she's like . . . really like. I happen to be Dawn McManus."

Ben Elliott opened his mouth as if to speak. Then closed it again and made a foolishly helpless movement with one hand. He stared at her and began to stammer.

"Why I . . . Why, you . . . Why, Able said! . . ." He laughed outright, then, as his misconception became clear. "Oh, if I'd given it a second thought I'd have known! Able first told me about you as a little girl. It stuck in my head; a little girl! But that was years ago, of course. . . . Gee! . . . Why, then you're lost in your back yard, as you might say."

"I was," she corrected. "But a few minutes ago I heard some one sing out; and just now the cook called the crew to supper."

"Then why didn't you—"

"Because I was rather curious to discover what sort of man is standing between me and poverty,"—perhaps ironically, this. "And, of course, I knew you weren't lost."

Elliott flushed on that.

"I played at being lost myself so I'd have a chance to talk to you. I'm glad I did . . . unless it has offended you."

"No. I'm . . . I'm only ready to go in, now."

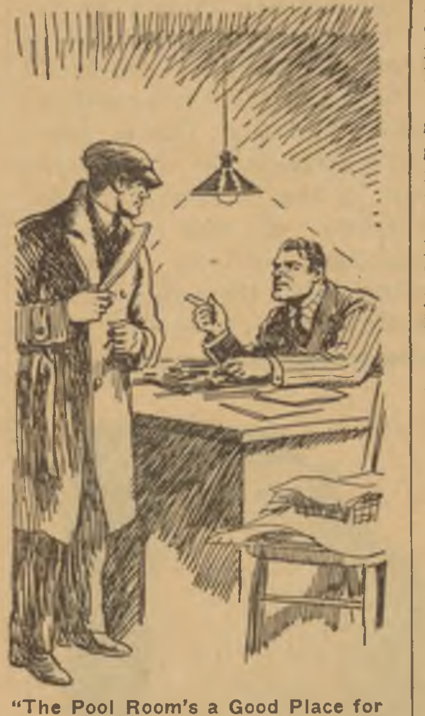
She adjusted the harness of her shoes dexterously and they set out. On the way to camp Ben tried to talk to her further but her responses were brief and non-committal. Her interest appeared to be only poorly aroused even on such a vital matter as the operation of her property, and so finally he gave up trying to make talk and broke trail thinking that now the job would have an added zest, that a girl like Dawn McManus was an ever greater incentive than the thought of a small child, alone, with her timber at the mercy of hard schemers, and depending on him to make safe her heritage.

In camp Blackmore, the veneer buyer, was waiting for Ben and after eating silently in the cook shanty with those two Dawn set out for Tincup with Blackmore, leaving Ben with considerable to think about besides revamping the mill and getting out choice logs.

CHAPTER VI

The new piston head for the locomotive arrived and Elliott was at the station when the train bearing it pulled in. More, he was close beside the express car when it halted and carried the part himself to his waiting sleigh.

The veneer logs were ready to come out to the siding. Standard cars had been set off at Hoot Owl that day. Tomorrow, bright and early, they would start loading and by night his contract with Blackmore would be filled. He would receive a large check, a substantial part of it clear profit, in return.



"The Pool Room's a Good Place for You to Be, Limpy."

His men were growing restless under the driving; whispers in camp had it that the job was broke beyond repair and he knew that to pass a pay day would send his crew scattering, a handicap which he could never overcome in time. But with the men held on the job and the mill ready to saw in another week he would be ready to give the Hoot Owl a fresh start, a new hold on hope.

And about the time he burrowed into the pillow Nicholas Brandon sat in his office talking to a pale, slender young man whose blue eyes smiled genially. Genially, yes, but in that quality was a flaw, one might have observed on close scrutiny. Familiarity with Limpy Holbrook might not breed contempt; but surely, in an alert man, it would stir an awareness for the need of caution soon or later.

Brandon now nodded slowly.

"All right. Don't start until dark. And do just as I've told you; don't forget to give yourself plenty of time. You can't travel fast."

"I get you, Mr. Brandon."

"Have you . . . That is, has he ever seen you?"

"He came into the pool room and I sold him tobacco the other day. We visited a minute."

"Friendly?"

"Nothing but!" The open smile had the cast of a leer as Holbrook made reply.

"The pool room's a good place for you to be, Limpy. Great center for news. Well . . . You keep on reporting everything that's said there. . . . Good night."

Holbrook limped out and Brandon, alone, puffed for a time on his cigar. Next, he opened a lower drawer and drew out a bottle of whisky. Only one drink remained in it. He frowned. A year ago he had procured that liquor; for nearly twelve months it had been scarcely touched. But since the night that old Don Stuart died its contents had been drawn upon frequently. His hands shook a bit as he lifted the bottle to his lips, now, but after drinking new strength began to surge through his body and he smiled. He looked at his watch after a time and then out into the street. After a time he rose and walked to the wall telephone.

"Give me Miss Coburn's house, will you?" he asked the operator. "Hello! Miss Co— Ah, Dawn! Its Uncle Nick talking. Want to go to the movie tonight?"

She seemed to hesitate and he tilted his head sharply, lips parted. Then her voice came.

"It's nice of you to think of me, Mr. Brandon. But I don't think I care to go with you tonight."

"Oh; sorry," he said genially enough but his brows gathered. "Another time, then,"

"Perhaps."

Her receiver clicked up and he turned away from the instrument scowling thoughtfully.

"Mister Brandon, eh?" he said softly. "And . . . No excuse. . . . Well!"

The last word was spoken with a snap, as though a chapter were closed.

He paced the floor slowly. He was brooding, planning, and by the look on his face it was evident that he planned good for no man . . . except, possibly Nicholas Brandon.

Perhaps he was thinking of the matter that was to confront Ben Elliott within twenty-four hours.

That young man was in high feather as the crew came in to supper. His locomotive had shunted the standard cars up from Hoot Owl before daylight and the veneer logs scattered along the steel had commenced going up at once.

Able had come driving out from town in mid-afternoon, Dawn beside him, and with an added thrill because of her presence Ben directed the loading of the last car, conscious that the girl's eyes were often on him with an expression which belied her apparent indifference when he tried to engage her in conversation.

It was dark when the jammer man swung the last log into place and toggles were made fast. Able and Dawn rode with Ben in the locomotive as they trundled down the track to camp.

"You boys have had a long day," Ben said to the engineer and fireman. "It won't get any darker. You eat your suppers here and we'll run 'em in this evening."

He turned to Able.

"Our contract calls for delivery in time to meet the local. She's been coming through a little before eight in the morning. Want to take no chance of having this stuff held up now. That would be a tough break!"

TO BE CONTINUED.

Serbia Always Markets Brides Through Broker

Many of the younger Serbians wish elders would abolish the custom of buying and selling brides, but the older generation can't see it that way. And the authorities are helpless to stop the practice, too, because negotiations between the parents involved are carried on in secret by a marriage broker, called the storjnik, and no one is wiser until it is settled.

The supporters of the old order claim they are put to great expense in rearing their daughters, and it is only right and fair that the bridegroom should pay for the added help he thus obtains for his household in taking a wife.

Prices vary greatly in this Serbian bride market, some fetching as high as 30,000 dinars (about $606), others as low as 2,000 dinars. A bride's worth is measured by her health, strength and knowledge of farm and household affairs. Beauty is a secondary consideration, but should the prospective wife possess it her value is enhanced.

In many instances when a suitor has been too poor to pay the price asked by the girl's parents, he has abducted his bride with the aid of friends. And as only the spilling of blood can wipe out the deep humiliation and disgrace of having a daughter "snatched," feuds lasting through generations have in this way begun.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Foot-Worm Disease

The malady which has been termed a foot-worm disease, is an infection of the feet by a thread-like, white nematode worm known as the onchocera flexuosa, which sometimes reaches a length of 10 inches, says the Detroit News. These parasites are found extended in the subcutaneous tissues, and, in advanced stages, coiled in cysts near the surface. Deer afflicted with this malady usually have inflamed and swollen feet, are often notably lame and in some cases the hoofs may even be loosened.

WHY not reason out the cause of this unnatural condition?

Your first thought may be, "I must eat more." That's not all. You should enjoy what you do eat. Frequently, the blood cells are low... and this, perhaps, is what makes you feel weak.

More Cars Bought But Fewer Roads Are Being Built

Chicago—Back in the early ression year of 1930, when till wasn't definite whether there was to be a depres-on, automobile ownership in his country reached a high f 26,500,000 vehicles. After rge decreases, in this year f 1935 there is strong evidence that again automobile ownership will pass the 26.-000,000 total.

Automobile production and sales are outstripping the totals of last year and early business is approaching the all-time peak. Most automobile makers are weeks behind demand.

These are pointed to as reasons for the increase; the trend to suburban communities, increased use of the car as a means of transportation to work, vacation travel increase as noted in the national park reports, the natural increase in people of car driving age, the automobile is becoming more and more a necessity, and possibly a warning depression is a factor.

All is not so bright for usage of the expected 26,000,000 cars, however. Construction of paved roads and streets and of the facilities that further add to safety and car driving economy, are far atrail in the automobiles' dust.

A number of factors, among them diversion or misuse of motor tax funds, heedless re-ction of motor tax rates and reading of highway dollars er too many miles of roads, re reasonable for falling off building of the type of facili-s warranted by motor ve-cle useage.

Here are facts presented by highway authorities to show that road needs are far from being supplied:

Automobile accidents are on the increase, with 1,250,000 accidents in 1934 claiming 35,-500 lives and nearly 900,000 injured. Elimination of grade crossings, widening of roads and streets, resurfacing, new paving all would tend to lessen this terrible toll.

The mileage of high type pavement is only about 5 per cent of the total roads in the United States.

This 160,000 mile is not even equivalent to the mileage of the busiest roads included in the main state highway systems, which total 382,600 miles and carry at least two-thirds of all country travel.

This paved mileage of 160,-000 is 100,00o miles short of the total mileage of cross country railroads.

State highway officials have listed with the federal government needed projects of a total cost of $1,7 0 0, 0 0 0 000 that could be built in the immediate future if the money were available.

Trucking Code Is To Continued

Continuance of the Trucking Code is assured, according to Geo. C. Harris chairman of the Alabama State Code Authority for the Trucking Industry, with headquarters in Birmingham.

Mr. Harris predicted that self-regulation of the industry with the NRA as umpire, will remain in effect whether or not the bills, before Congress, to place trucks under control of the Interstate Commerce Commission are enacted. The measures, which are now in the hands of committees of both houses of Congress, propose that administration of the Trucking Code be transferred to the office of Federal Coordinator of Transportation Joseph B. Eastman.

Hearings at Washington on the renewal of the NRA, Mr. Harris said, indicate a disposition on the part of members of Congress to continue codes, at least for the major industries. The Trucking Code is the third largest under NRA.

With assurances from Coordinator Eastman, the nation's highest ranking transportation expert, that the Trucking Code should remain "in full force and effect" because 'there are certain desirable things ..... which can often be accomplished better by a code than in any other way," the Alabama State Code Authority for the Trucking Industry is conducting an even more intensive campaign this year to obtain full compliance from every for-hire truck operator in the state.

The second Code period started February 11. Although the new campaign is just getting under way, registrations so far indicate that the industry has found Code self-control to it's liking.

Under the Code, operators are required to register, file rates, observe maximum working hours and subscribe to a minimum wage scale. Failure to comply with these provisions constitutes a Federal offense and is punishable with heavy fines.

Cases of Trucking Code violations, Mr. Harris pointed out are being taken into court. Although the new Code year is not yet two months old, twice as many cases have been filed in the courts than in the entire first Code period. This is partically attributable to estabment by the National Code Authority of nine regional compliance offices, placed strategically throughout the country, to cooperate with local authorities in preparing cases for Court action.

Registration offices in Alabama have been set up at Albertville, Anniston, Decatur Guntersville, Jasper, Monroeville, Montgomery, Ozark, Tuscaloosa, Huntsville, Boaz, and Uriah. Mr. Harris urges all non registered members to comply immediately.

UP!

Food, Clothing, Rent and Everything Except Electricity in Alabama

Back in pre-depression days, folks thought a lot about the means of living high. Now they're bothering about the high cost of merely living. And rightly so. Ham and eggs, clothing, rent —in fact most everything in the family budget is going up, UP, UP And take it from the "powers that be," the end is not yet in sight. Recent press dispatches out of Washington say the high cost of living is actually going to jump considerably more these next few months.

But there's one exception to the general rule of higher prices. That's electricity in Alabama. Almost every home in Alabama is getting electricity today lots cheaper than a year ago. And the end is not in sight. With increased use of electric appliances —ranges, water heaters and refrigerators—average rates in Alabama for electricity—already the cheapest item in the household budget—will keep on going down, DOWN, D O W N. Which is pleasing to a lot of Alabama folks. As for instance these customers, who have been kind enough to write us.

Mrs. A. G. Westbrook, Demopolis, Ala., writes: "I have just learned that a further reduction in your residential rate for electricity is now in effect, and naturally, I am very much pleased, especially since the prices of all other commodities which go into the usual household budget have been steadily rising during the past year or so."

"I have read a lot about low rates in other places, but it seems to me that Alabama is the real place to look for low rates," writes Mrs. Eugene Smith, of Ozark.

Sam D. Daily, Centreville, Ala., wrote: "I wish everybody would start a crusade to make taxes as low as your prices for electricity —maybe the reason some of us don't use any more electricity than we do, cheap as it is, is because we have to save all our spare change to pay taxes with."

"I wish the price of other necessities of life we have to buy were as cheap as electricity," says Mrs. H. O. Hinton, 711 14th Ave.. Tuscaloosa, Ala.

Wish we had space to print more of the scores of letters we have recently received. We'd surely like to hear from readers of Power News what they think about the cheap electricity they buy from us.

IT WONT BE LONG NOW

Hot Weather's on the Way. Is Your New Refrigerator?

Something tells us that it won't be long now before these sizzling summer days are with us once again. It's been an early Spring and that usually means a long, hot summer.

But nowadays summer in the South can be quite livable, in fact enjoyable, provided people are prepared to give hot days the proper greeting. The best imaginable aid to summer comfort is good refrigeration, now within the easy reach of almost any pocketbook. First requirement of good refrigeration is a good refrigerator—ice or electric. This season there are many improved makes and models of both electric and ice refrigerators, which enable you to make those tasty summer treats—frozen salads, and desserts —appetite tempters on hot days and nights. Which reminds us to tell you that our Spring sale of electric refrigerators begins—no fooling—on April 1st. Won't you come by and see them?

Guard Your Eyes Urges Helen Keller

World Famous Blind Woman Makes Eyesight Appeal to Boys and Girls

Miss Keller, who was born in Tuscumbia, Ala., was deaf, dumb and blind when 19 months old. Today she is an authoress famous throughout the world. Recently she wrote, "My message to you dear boys and girls, is this: Be careful of your eyes, guard them as you would your most loved possession. When you read or study make certain you have plenty of glareless light, so that your eyes will not be subjected to strain. Remember, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

●

Surveys show that not one home in ten is well lighted, according to new scientific knowledge. In the majority of homes, children are actually becoming near-sighted because parents don't realize how much light they need for studying. To give you the benefit of this new knowledge about light and eyes, we are offering a new free service. Telephone and our lighting experts will come to your home and measure your lights with a SIGHT METER, the remarkable little instrument that measures light and tells whether there is enough of it.

MARVELS

III

Nero, the Roman Emperor, had slaves bring snow from the mountains to cool his wines. Alexander the Great had trenches dug for storing snow. Sir Walter Scott told how Saladin, leader of the Mohammedan armies, sent a frozen sherbet to Richard the Lion Hearted, much to the amazement of that famous monarch. What a marvel ice was in the "good old days"! But now—it's a necessity. With hot weather just around the corner of the calendar, isn't it about time to think about that new electric or ice refrigerator?

IV

It gets mighty hot in South Africa. But there's going to be at least one place where the weather man will be compelled to behave. Three huge machines have been made by the Carrier Engineering Corporation, Newark, N. J., to cool the air for the world's deepest gold mine, Robinson Deep, in South Africa. Cooled, conditioned air will be sent down to the depths of the mine workings—8,385 feet—over a mile and a half. Down there the temperature is close to 100 degrees, and men work at less than 30% efficiency. In many Alabama plants, and stores and offices, efficiency of workers can be likewise increased by air conditioning. Our engineers will gladly show you how.

V

Fog has always been the greatest enemy of safe transportation on sea, air and land. But modern science bids fair to conquer it. Not long ago near Dayton, Ohio, a cloud seven miles long and almost a half mile thick was banished from the sky in seven minutes! A new and improved electrically operated mechanism, tried out in Buzzard's Bay in one of the year's densest fogs, cut out of that fog a clearing 100 feet wide, 2000 yards long. Some folks are "foggy" about the cost of electricity in Alabama. That kind of fog can also be cleared away—electrically. All such people need is to start using complete electric service—cooking, water heating, refrigeration, etc.—to learn how really cheap electricity is in Alabama, because the more you use the cheaper it is.

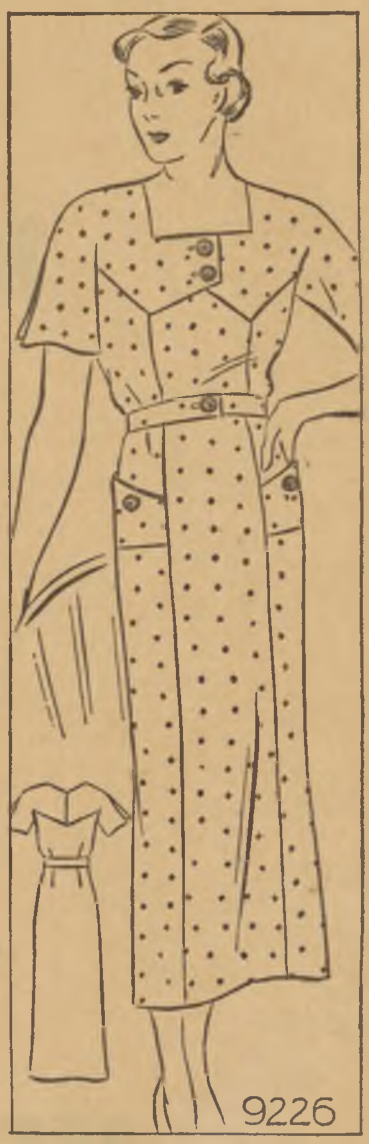
HAS ALL POINTS OF DISTINCTION

PATTERN 9226



You'll have no moment of dark despair if an old friend comes in to see you unexpectedly and you're dressed in this nicely tailored house frock! For it's especially designed to flatter larger figures, and fashioned along lines as chic as a street or sports frock. The sleeves, cut in one with that pretty, double-pointed yoke, have a little inverted pleat to make them jaunty and oh! so comfortable to work in! And the neat panel at the front sweeps all the way from hem to yoke to give you a long, slim line. If you'd be practical as well as attractive, choose a gaily printed cotton fabric, gingham, percale, lawn or seersucker, as they launder so beautifully and wear so well.

Pattern 9226 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44. Size 36 requires 3¾ yards 36 inch fabric.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE of each pattern.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth Street, New York.

SOLD!

On a busy Saturday a lady telephoned for three theater seats.

"Very sorry—not a seat left," said the box office attendant, "but we have one private box."

"Oh!" said the lady, "that's no use! I can't see anything from a private box!"

"Perhaps not, madam," retorted the diplomatist, "but everybody can see you!"

The box was sold immediately.

Political Economy

"Yes," answered Farmer Corntossel. "He got some great political ideas. But as for economy he gets deeper in debt every year."

"Low Visibility"

Washington.—Air pilots use an expression that I want to appropriate in connection with a discussion of the country's economic situation and its relation to the administration policies and plans. The pilots refer to "low visibility" and "low ceiling" when they want to say that they cannot see far in the distance. It seems to me that the clarity, or lack of it, with respect to current economic conditions warrants the use of the term "low visibility"—if any credence whatsoever is to be placed in the statements and activities of business leaders.

Government agencies by the dozen have been issuing rapid fire reports in recent weeks showing how industrial production is improved, how the price level has shown signs pleasing to industry, if not to the consumers, and how the volume of bank clearings is progressing upward. Bank deposits were seven billion dollars higher at the end of 1934 than at the end of 1933. The Reconstruction Finance corporation is having difficulty in keeping its borrowers from paying back the loans and the Securities and Exchange commission recently was made very happy by application of a great packing company to list forty-five million dollars in new securities.

The treasury has been pursuing what is regarded as orthodox financial policies and a good many other agencies appear to be veering away from the leftists' course that so long dominated Roosevelt policies. All of these, it seems, ought to be reassuring to business, whether that business be the great corporations or the little tradesmen in the corner groceries. But there has been a fly in the ointment and that seems to be the reason why masses of capital and a goodly percentage of the country's population shares uncertainty about the future economic condition.

I have sought answers to this puzzle in many quarters and I have had many different explanations. It is made to appear, however, from the weight of opinion that I have gathered that the relief rolls are the cause of this lack of faith. It has been recorded previously that approximately twenty-two million persons, about one-sixth of our population, are living on relief. This staggering total, the highest ever known, obviously represents a basic weakness somewhere and the administration is seeking to locate that weakness. This total has been reached by a steady growth. It has not come suddenly. The circumstance, therefore, has led many individuals to the conviction that Mr. Roosevelt's reform measures are failures.

Perhaps it is a lack of understanding on the part of business that prompts it to keep its pen in its pocket and its check-book closed under these conditions. It may be that business leaders have failed to read the possibilities represented by increased production and the other signs of an improved economy. Nevertheless, business apparently has found it difficult to see far or clearly into the future. It seems to look upon the economic condition as having a "low ceiling" and "low visibility."

More Messages

Washington correspondents were startled in the President's press conference the other day when he let it be known that he plans four additional messages to congress this session, not including his recent bitter denunciation of the holding companies when he asked that action be had on that bill. It was not the number of messages that surprised the correspondents; it was the fact that the President said with some frankness that he did not know what subjects would be treated in them. To most of the observers it seemed wholly reasonable that the President should be unwilling to outline those messages, but it was incomprehensible that he should admit his inability to say what subjects would be handled.

After that information came out of the White House there was a noticeable sinking in the optimism of a great many men who count for something in the country's business structure. Most of them said frankly that they did not know which way to turn. Among their numbers were more who believed sincerely that the President was giving up some of his numerous New Deal experiments and was proceeding on ground which the conservative thought considers to be solid. The reaction to work of this kind always has been and always will be bad from the standpoint of the political party in power.

Added to the circumstances I have just mentioned, one should remember how congress normally is unpopular with the business community. In many years past I have heard the plaint of business representatives in Washington asking or urging for adjournment. Business men normally feel that the less work congress gets done and the sooner it leaves the halls of the Capitol, the better conditions will be. The same is true now, only more so.

It may as well be admitted that the current session of congress is here for a considerable number of weeks. This is true for several reasons. In the first instance, many of the members feel that they want to be legislators and not rubber stamps any longer. There is no longer the overwhelming fear among congressmen of the President's power. They have shown this several times lately, including the forty-nine day battle over the public works bill.

Feeling their independence again, members of the house and senate have begun to press for action on legislation carrying out their own ideas. Much of this runs counter to administration ideas on legislation. Further clashes are inevitable. When there are confliction of plans in congress you can expect to see a long-drawn-out session, and since this is not an election year, there is no need for the members to rush home to mend their political fences.

It is not strange, therefore, that business as a whole is worried about congress. The business leaders themselves insist that it is not strange that they are worried about the secrecy which surrounds the President's plans. The two circumstances, taken together, obviously serve as a brake on the wheels of industry because now as always in the past business will not risk the last vestige of its capital resources unless it can be assured of stability.

Useless Opposition

While the Democrats, the party in power, are floundering, the Republicans lie wholly dormant. Seldom in my experience in Washington has the opposition party been as useless as the Republicans now seem to be. They are making no effort at all to gather funds for use by Chairman Henry P. Fletcher of the Republican national committee in taking advantage of vulnerable spots in the Democratic armor. In fact, they have left Mr. Fletcher rather high and dry and when he attempts to do anything one faction or another shoots harder at him than at its natural rivals, the Democrats.

I have heard expressions lately to the effect that Mr. Fletcher has a golden opportunity at hand. He is in the enviable position of being able every time he is criticized by his own partisans to point out that the help they are giving him is worse than nil and that criticism under such a circumstance does not become them. The thought is that Mr. Fletcher by taking the bull by the horns, becoming militant and mapping out a program with which his wide knowledge of politics equips him, could become actually the dominant Republican force in this country. Thus far Mr. Fletcher has sat back in his easy chair and has taken all the darts. Some observers are asking how long that can continue and the Republican party remain alive.

Early in the Roosevelt administration the Republican policy was to avoid criticism of the Democratic leadership at all times. They declared, and openly announced their views, that if they criticized Mr. Roosevelt and his New Deal they would be characterized as obstructionists. If the New Deal failed the Democrats surely would place the blame on the Republican opposition. But political writers here tell me that Mr. Roosevelt's political honeymoon has been over quite a while and that there is, in their opinion, no need for the Republicans longer to stick their heads in the sand after the manner of the ostrich, and see nothing.

* * *

Concrete Highways

As the administration gets its hands on fresh supplies of money, a strong demand has set up for more concrete highways. There seems to be almost a propaganda in favor of constructing concrete highways here, there and everywhere, including two or three or four transcontinental, high speed roadways.

The new public works bill carries a considerable sum for highway construction and it is quite natural that dealers in road materials and equipment want to get hold of it. My inquiries among road-building authorities lead me to believe, however, that the use of these funds ought to be examined closely and any program that is mapped out should be the result of careful study. Around the Department of Agriculture there is a chronic complaint that too many through highways and not enough farm-to-market roads have been constructed. If that be correct, the authorities tell me, then the concrete road-building program will have to be revamped or else there will be hundreds of miles of concrete roadway constructed at an expense so great that it can be called reckless waste.

Some years ago the bureau of public roads made a statistical study which indicated that a concrete roadway, as distinguished from other hard-surface highways, was unjustified unless the daily volume of automobile traffic approximated fifteen hundred cars. It is to be remembered that a concrete roadway costs several times as much as when other materials are used in hard-surface construction. So the public roads statistician figured out the life of a roadway built of less expensive materials would be of sufficient length to warrant use of the cheaper material where the volume of travel was low.

Suddenly Polite
Why? He Is Prepared
Thought for Atheists
Strange Hangings

Arthur Brisbane

How politely Germany is treated, suddenly, by the "victorious allies"! Recently Germany was kicked around, all her money taken by the allies, French and English soldiers camping on her territory at her expense, the Versailles treaty sternly enforced.

What a change now! England sends a clever statesman to talk it over with Hitler the moment he throws the Versailles treaty on to the rubbish heap.

France is almost polite in messages to Germany. No more threats; no more "Do as we say!"

You know what causes this. Hitler lets it be known that he has been preparing for a war in case anybody wants one; that Germany has a well drilled army of half a million men and an enormous fleet of commercial airplanes that could drop explosive bombs and poison gas most conveniently.

In other words, Germauy is prepared, willing, ready and able to fight if anybody insists on it.

So nobody insists.

There may be a lesson there for this country, that, if attacked, could only throw a few lumps of gold at the enemy and plead: "Please be nice."

Flying is like human life in this, you do not see what it is that pulls you along through the upper air.

You look at the three engines, sticking out into space ahead of you, and see no sign of power, nothing to explain the speed and climbing power or what it is that keeps you aloft.

The propellers move at a speed that makes them invisible. You know that you move, but do not see what moves you.

A clergyman might find a text for atheists in that. Your atheist, or gentleman from Senegambia, would say: "Do not talk to me of a trinity of propellers that haul me to my destination and my destiny. If there were any such propellers I should see them."

In Austria, Nazis are supposed to have murdered the Austrian chancellor, Dollfuss. Now the government that succeeds Dollfuss will hang 17 Nazis as a start. There is nothing novel in that. Where you have dictatorship you have wholesale killings. They go together.

The interesting thing is the method of hanging in Austria. They have no "drop" which causes the criminal to break his neck by the jerk of his own weight. A noose is put around the criminal's neck, and as he hangs "assistant executioners" pull at his feet until he chokes to death. It must be a disagreeable spectacle, even for the "assistant executioners."

Learned professors tell you the saying "beautiful but dumb" is silly, untrue. On the contrary, beauty and intelligence go together. Also, there is no intelligence that is not beautiful in itself.

Follow intelligence up through the animal kingdom. Your female gorilla is a horribly ugly creature. The chimpanzee, more intelligent, is less ugly. The lowest female savage, horrible to look at, is less atrociously ugly than the female chimpanzee, and so on all the way up.

Convicts at work in a California county road camp, in Elizabeth canyon, rebelled "because they had no hashed-brown potatoes" for breakfast. It was a substantial breakfast—prunes, cereal, griddle cakes, but no hashed-brown potatoes.

Men change. When Parmentier, for whom the excellent potato soup, potage Parmentier, is named, brought the first potatoes to France nobody would eat them.

An intelligent king ordered the nobles at court to wear potato blossoms in their buttonholes in the spring. Immediately the common people said, "Potatoes must be good" and ate them.

The name suggested for a new state, that would be number forty-nine, is "Absaroka," a name and state to be created by putting together western North Dakota, the northern third of Wyoming and one row of counties along the southern border of Montana.

That dreadful name chosen for this forty-ninth state, "Absaroka," is the name of the Crow Indian nation.

As long as it is to be one of the United States, why not select a United States name, Lincoln, Edison, or some other with a meaning?

Two Americans, Mr. and Mrs. Switz from East Orange, N. J., with twenty alleged accomplices, accused of spying for Russia, will be tried in Paris within a few days. The Switzes and others are accused of informing "a foreign power" of French secrets concerning high explosives, planes built to fly through the stratosphere and across the Atlantic in six hours, and "chemical warfare secrets," which means recipes for more deadly gases.

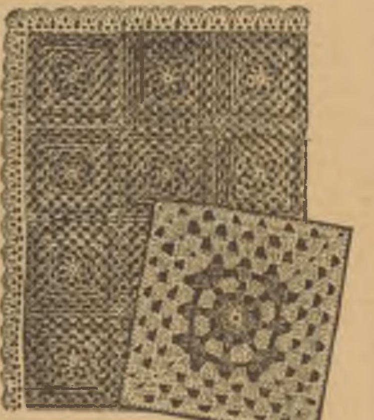
Simple Motif in Bedspread Design

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



Some needleworkers hesitate when it comes to crocheting a bedspread, because too much work and time is required to finish it. The design shown above is about the simplest pattern known and works up fast. This model is worked in cream, rose and yellow carpet warp and measures 4¼ inches for each square. Find the size spread you want to make and then figure how many squares it will take. You will be surprised how fast the work progresses if you spend only spare time on making the squares, and the little material required to take with you when not working at home. When the squares are finished slip-stitch together and finish with a simple edging. The squares may be set together point to point, thereby producing a pointed edge instead of straight.

This is one of the thirty motifs shown in book No. 27, all illustrated with instructions, and will be sent to you postpaid upon receipt of 15c.

The use of these motifs is not limited to spreads. By using different sizes of thread many attractive and useful articles can be crocheted.

A mass meeting of United Mine Workers of America was held at Boothton, Alabama on April 5 with between 3000 and 4000 present.

The chairman of the meeting was O. O. Pinson, of Belle Ellen, who introduced the speakers of the evening.

Talks were given by W. H. Huey, District Representative, Walter Jones, District Rep. W. H. Rainey,, Int. Rep. and William Mitch, President of District No. 20 all of the U. M. W. of A., respectively.

Mr. Mitch outlined the position of the coal miners at present stating that the miners of Alabama were behind the government and the President of the U. S. in the extension of the Coal Code until June 16, 1935. He also stated that the coal compaines seemed to want a reduction in wages and hours which is absolutely out of harmony with the President's program, also that the miners of Alabama were looking for a raise and not a reduction due to the rise in commodities.

The miners of Alabama are ready to go to work when the coal companies are ready to comply with the executive order of the President, and are not on strike as generally believed.

Girl Scout News

The second Spring Festival of Montevallo Girl Scouts took place on Saturday evening in Palmer Hall..

The opening Flag Ceremony of nations, which was put on by troop number four, was quite colorful and educational.

The two plays "Magic Goto Pieces," by troop 2, and "Convincing Dad" by troop 3, both were ably rendered and troop one's "Making of an Eaglet" with the aid of Mrs. Kennerlys Brownie pack was appropriate and impressive.

The singing by the entire group of eighty Girl Scouts under Dorothy Waites direction was a feature of the occasions with selections of vaired types from the lighter to the more classical of the Scout songs.

The folk dance from the Wilton girls,, troop 5 added variety and interest.

Of very special interest, was the formal presentaion of a beautiful United States flag as a gift from the David Lindsay Chapter, Daughters of American Revolution.

Mrs. A. W. Vaughn Council Commissioner accepted the gift.

The outcome of this event was quite gratifying to the local Scouting personell. There were two troops more than participated in the 34 Festival and the entire program showed marked improvement over the first attempt one year ago.

Grateful acknowledgement is made to the Montevallo Times for printing the programs for our spring festival.

Troop Number Two's Hike

Girl Scout troop number 2 met at the home of our leader, Mrs. A. W. Vaughn, on Saturday, March 16. We were joined there by our lieutenant, Frances Lee and Miss Maxine Teal. Then we motored to Aldrich, we left the car there and hiked to Davis Falls, On our way there we saw many wild flowers. We passed a spring but we did not drink from it. After a pleasant walk we reached the falls and stopped to admire them and rest. We left our supplies there and started to the second falls. We observed the trees and wild flowers as we walked. Some thought the second falls even more beautiful than the first.

We returned to the first falls where we had left our supplies. We then built our fires and cooked our lunch.

Nye's Committee Offers Drastic War-Profit Bill—Austria Decides to Enlarge Its Army—Progress of European Peace Negotiations.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.

Senator Nye

SENATOR GERALD P. NYE'S munitions committee, which has spent seven months investigating the doings of the manufacturers of arms and armament, reported to the senate its measure designed to take the profits out of war and provide for the conscription of industry in the event of another armed conflict involving the United States. The bill is decidedly drastic, giving to the President in war time powers that are practically dictatorial, permitting him not only to fix prices but also to license all industry and control raw materials. It also has taxation features that will arouse considerable opposition. It would raise individual income taxes to 6 per cent in wartime, levy surtaxes up to 94 per cent on incomes in excess of $10,000, and seize profits of corporations in excess of 6 per cent return on invested capital.

The Nye bill gives the President very broad powers to fix prices of commodities, to license industry, to enjoin profiteering and to prevent the hoarding of goods. It provides for the drafting of industrial leaders, who would be permitted to remain with their companies, subject to military law and given rank and compensation not exceeding that of a brigadier general.

Meanwhile the house military affairs committee reported the McSwain bill, similar to the senate measure but without the tax features. This lack made the more radical members angry but when they tried to amend the bill they were routed, 258 to 71.

The Nye senate committee, after reporting its bill, continued its inquiry. It heard a rather sensational bit of evidence to the effect that Roger S. McGrath, an insurance company agent who was described as a friend of the President's son James, had sought successfully to obtain two naval building contracts for the Bath Iron Works up in Maine.

FOLLOWING the example set by Hitler, Austria has decided to disregard the limitations on its military strength set by the treaty of St. Germain and to increase its armed forces immediately. The official communique issued by Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg did not say how big the army would be or whether conscription would be restored. The annual spring parade of the army at the Ringstrasse in Vienna was revived, and the troops appeared in fine new uniforms.

It is believed Hungary and Bulgaria soon will ask permission to increase their armies and re-introduce conscription.

M. Litvinov

SOVIET Russia is ready to line up with Great Britain, France and Italy in promoting the general European security pact which is the basis of England's plan for peace. This was brought out by the visit to Moscow of Capt. Anthony Eden, British lord privy seal, and his conferences with Dictator Josef Stalin and Maxim Litvinov, Soviet foreign commissar. According to the joint communique given the press, these statesmen "were of the opinion that in the present international situation it is more than ever necessary to pursue the endeavor to promote the building up of a system of collective security in Europe as contemplated in the Anglo-French communique of the third of February, and in conformity with the principles of the League of Nations."

It was made clear that Germany and Poland would be welcome to enter the arrangement, but that it would go ahead even without them.

Captain Eden then went on to Warsaw to talk things over with the Poles; and even as he was departing from Moscow the Soviet press launched another fierce attack on Germany. Michael Tukhachevsky, vice commissar for defense, in an article in the newspaper Pravda, declared Germany would have an army of 849,000 by the summer, exceeding the French army by 40 per cent and almost equaling the Soviet army in size.

He charged Hitler with "lulling France to sleep" with anti-Soviet war talk in the hope France would not realize her own peril.

Tukhachevsky's view that Germany contemplates attacking France was supported by an authorized article in the weekly Journal de Moscou which asserted the leaders of the reich realized "the exceptional risk to which Germany would subject herself by invasion of the tremendous territories of the U. S. S. R.—a country possessing powerful armaments and unlimited opportunities for improving and increasing these armaments."

"It is almost probable," the Journal said, "that under certain circumstances Hitler will prefer other fields of aggression, and an intensified revision of the map of Europe will be started not in the east but in the west."

PREMIER MUSSOLINI is highly skeptical of the success of efforts to persuade Germany to enter into general peace plans for Europe. In his newspaper, Popolo d'Italia, appeared an editorial, probably written by il duce himself, warning his fellow countrymen that no miraculous results may be expected from the conference of foreign ministers in Stresa. It asserted that the western European powers "must stabilize their line of common action against several eventualities which can be foreseen, and they must take definite responsibility."

It then charged that the French and British are impeding Mussolini's wish to take action against Hitler because of their preoccupation about their own internal policy.

Premier Flandin and Foreign Minister Laval of France were reported to have devised a vast, new, flexible plan to organize the peace of the continent within the framework of the League of Nations.

POLAND appears to have decided to play a lone hand in the European embroglio, though she remains friendly to Germany. It is reported that Captain Eden's visit to Warsaw was as disappointing as was that of Sir John Simon to Berlin. The Polish government is determined to sign no pact that would commit the nation to fight for Russia against Germany or for Germany against Russia and France, nor will it permit either German or Russian troops to be transported across Poland. The Polish statesmen say they will sign a series of bilateral pacts, and will go as far as any other nation in parallel disarmament. They assert that they have no alliance with Germany, though their mutual troubles have been settled for the next ten years, and that the alliance with France still holds good.

Eiji Amau

FROM Tokyo there came a statement indicating that Japan would give at least moral support to the European powers that are seeking agreements to counteract Hitler's move for the re-armament of Germany. It was given out by Eiji Amau, the frequently quoted spokesman for the foreign office. He said Japan will hold aloof from the European crisis and that there would be no far eastern Locarno pact, but that "we cannot think of any alliance with Germany." Tokyo, asserted Amau, is ready to discuss with Russia some degree of demilitarization of the eastern frontiers.

FOREIGN nations that discriminate against American imports have been warned by President Roosevelt that they must discontinue that practice under penalty of economic reprisals by the United States. In a letter to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau the President outlined his foreign trade policy and disclosed the fact that the administration is considering denouncing existing trade pacts with Germany, Italy, Portugal and Denmark because of discrimination. He proclaimed the new Belgian-American reciprocal trade agreement, and also decreed that, pending the conclusion of negotiations for new pacts now in progress, the reduced duties and other concessions granted Belgium will be extended to Canada, Spain, The Netherlands, Switzerland and Lichtenstein for six months.

DEBATE on the Copeland-Tugwell food, drug, cosmetic and advertising bill was lively in the senate, and the opposition was led by a Democrat, Josiah W. Bailey of North Carolina, who urged the retention of the present food and drug law with such amendments as changed conditions require.

"I understand the Department of Agriculture was created to foster agriculture and not to govern advertising," Senator Bailey said. "It is inconceivable to me that it should take charge of medicine, cosmetics, and advertising. There might be an argument that the department has made such great triumphs in agriculture that it is seeking new worlds to conquer. But I believe that if some one should make that boast, I should agree that it had exceeded Samson in the slaughter of pigs, but had fallen far short of doing as good work in the matter of cotton as has the boll weevil."

STANLEY REED, the new solicitor general, obtained from the Supreme court permission to dismiss the government's appeal in the Belcher lumber code case. Therefore there probably will be no decision as to the constitutionality of the national industrial recovery act by the chief tribunal before congress takes action on the bill to extend the recovery law.

WHEN the Illinois legislature, at the behest of Governor Horner and the federal administration, passed a state recovery act the New Dealers hailed this as an example that all states should follow. Now County Judge Homer W. Hall at Bloomington has held that the act is unconstitutional. He also declared the national automobile code inoperative as applied to Illinois.

Under the state recovery act, the judge remarked, an unlawful delegation of the authority of the state legislature has brought about a situation whereby violations of the state act can be prosecuted by the state only through the sanction and by the authority of the federal director of codes.

THROUGH the efforts of Donald Richberg, chairman of the NIRB, an agreement was reached by the bituminous coal operators and the United Mine Workers, whereby the prevailing coal code is extended to June 16 and a threatened strike of about half a million miners averted. The present wages and hours of work are continued. President Lewis of the miners insisted the union had not yielded to the operators; but the fact remained that if it had not consented to the agreement Mr. Richberg could and would have extended the code by executive order.

SCORES of agents of the Department of Justice's division of investigation were carrying on a concentrated search for three men now listed as the worst "public enemies" at large, according to Chief J. Edgar Hoover. The three are: Alvin Karpis, twenty-five, a leader in the notorious Barker-Karpis kidnap and bank robbery gang; Raymond Hamilton, twenty-two, killer who broke jail while awaiting execution, and Thomas H. Robinson, Jr., twenty-eight, kidnaper of Mrs. Alice Speed Stoll, wealthy young society matron of Louisville, Ky.

ONE of America's leading sculptors, Augustus Lukeman, died in New York at the age of sixty-four years. After Borglum was ousted by the Confederate memorial committee in 1925, Lukeman took over the work of carving the huge memorial on the face of Stone mountain in Georgia, completing it in 1928. He was chief of sculptors at the World's fair in Chicago.

OBEYING alleged directions from the yacht on which President Roosevelt was fishing in Florida waters, the majority in the house refused to accept the restrictions injected in the work relief bill and sent it back to conference to have these removed.

The restrictions objectionable to the administration were those requiring senate confirmation of administrative officers of the program and that in loans and grants to states at least one-third of the money should be expended for direct labor. The latter requirement, according to Secretary Ickes and others, would result in the exclusion of rural electrification, slum clearance and similar projects.

Defending the move to send the bill back to conference, Buchanan of Georgia said: "The President is assuming responsibility. All we ask is to give him a bill that he can work on in shifting from dole to employment."

In replying to Buchanan, Representative Robert Bacon (Rep., N. Y.) contended that the labor provision was needed in order to "kick out pet local projects" and afford as much direct relief of unemployment as possible.

"Congress has reached a pretty low ebb," declared Minority Leader Bertrand Snell (Rep., N. Y.), "when it can't even pass on a conference report without receiving orders from the Chief Executive."

FOR the second time the United States Supreme court reversed the convictions and death sentences of two of the Scottsboro negroes who were accused of assault on two white girls. The court held that since negroes in Alabama are not permitted to serve on juries, they are denied "equal protection of the laws" in violation of the Fourteenth amendment. It declared the state court erred in not quashing the indictments.

This was a big victory for the colored race, but in another decision by the Supreme court the negroes were the losers. The tribunal ruled that the Democratic party in Texas is a voluntary association, not subject to control by the state legislature, and as such may exclude colored persons from voting in its primaries.

DIRECT negotiations with Italy over the border dispute were broken off by the Ethiopian government, which sent a new note to the League of Nations. Special measures were taken to protect foreigners in Addis Ababa. The Italian government did not take this rupture seriously, still hoping a peaceful arrangement might be reached without the intervention of the league.

NINETEEN cardinals met with Pope Pius in a secret consistory, and to them he delivered an emphatic denunciation of war, which, he said, "would be so enormous a crime, so foolish a manifestation of fury, we believe it absolutely impossible." If, however, there is someone who wishes to commit "this nefarious crime," then, the holy father said, he could do nothing else than pray to God to "destroy those people who desire war."

The consistory approved the canonization of Blessed Thomas More, King Henry VIII's chancellor, and Bishop John Fisher of England, who lost their heads for opposing Henry's marriage to Anne Boleyn.

Erroneous Belief That Bees Know Their Owners

"Bees never come to know their owner," says James I. Hambleton, agriculturist in the bureau of entomology, dispelling the belief that beekeepers do not get stung, because their bees know them. "Every person who works with bees will be stung occasionaly. The layman who is stung most often is probably nervous and afraid of bees. Apiarists are well aware that their bees never get to know them. One who understands bees can work as safely in another apiary as in his own."

Bee specialists also point out that the worker bees, which do the stinging, do so only in defense of their hive, and even then only a few assume the responsibility of guards, leaving the others free to go about their work. If all bees rushed at once to the defense of the hive, and were successful in stinging their victim, there would be no workers left, because in stinging, a bee not only loses its sting but also loses its life. Away from the hive, bees are intent upon their work and can scarcely be induced to sting, unless they are caught and crushed.—Boston Transcript.

SYNOPSIS

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the lumbering town of Tincup, with Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. He defeats Bull Duval, "king of the river," and town bully, in a log-birling contest. Nicholas Brandon, the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence, trying to force him to leave town and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Elliott is arrested and finds a friend in Judge Able Armitage. The judge hires him to run the one lumber camp, the Hoot Owl, that Brandon has not been able to grab. This belongs to Dawn McManus, whose father has disappeared with a murder charge hanging over his head. Brandon sends Duval to beat up Ben, and Ben worsts him in a fist fight and throws him out of camp. Don Stuart dies, leaving a letter for Elliott "to be used when the going becomes too tough." Ben refuses to open the letter, believing he can win the fight by his own efforts. Fire breaks out in the mill. Ben, leading the victorious fight against the flames, discovers the fire was started with gasoline. Elliott gets an offer of spot cash for logs, that will provide money to tide him over. But a definite time limit is set. Ben meets Dawn McManus and discovers she is not a child, as he had supposed, but a beautiful young woman. The railroad bridge, over which the Hoot Owl lumber must pass, and at once, to meet the time limit imposed in the contract, is blown up. By superhuman efforts Ben builds a new bridge overnight.

Elliott had her wide open, now, and the loads, on that grade, ran easily despite the binding cold in their journals. The rock and pitch of the engine were beyond belief. It seemed as though its weight must carry the light steel from its spikes as the careening threw tons of strain first one way and then the other.

The curve at the trestle's approach rushed up the valley toward him and through Elliott's mind swam all manner of misgivings. It seemed at the moment that if by any freak chance the wheels should stay on the rails, then those rails must surely give before the strain that the train's flight would exert as it took that curve. He threw one quick glance backward to see Tim Jeffers crouched on his high perch as a circus rider might stand on his boldly galloping steed. The old man chewed briskly and, as he caught a flash of Ben's face, spat and made one impressive gesture with a mittened hand, bidding the younger man get outside.

Ben had done all that he could do in the cab. Nothing within his power would be of avail if they left the track and, inside, he would have no chance at all should the wild run come to its end in the smoking waters of the river.

And so he backed into the gangway between tank and engine and slid down to the step, clinging to the hand rails, staring ahead, ready to let go if the worst, and the highly probable, happened.

The curve was there, a train's length beyond.

It was there, the length of their locomotive ahead. . . . The trucks took it with a screech and a bounce and a grind. She turned sharply and Ben thought he felt her tipping, tilting, the step beneath his feet rising as the force that strove them off at a tangent asserted itself. . . . He swung far out, to give her that much more balance, and they were straightening out with the loads thundering and clanking and leaping behind and he breathed deeply, realizing that for the interval his lungs had not functioned.

Elliott looked back again. Tim's knees were bent still lower. He was leaning far to the right and he nodded sharply as if in triumph.

And now they charged at the bridge, at that rough, new crossing of Hoot Owl. The engine bounced and quivered and seemed to stumble as she took the newly laid track. But she slammed back to balance and her tires chewed the frost, and they were over and charging the rise beyond!

Ben clambered back into the cab and tugged at the throttle, cursing because it would not open wider. He strained as though by his very posture to help the machinery meet that demand upon it. Nobly, the little locomotive breasted the rise; bravely she lunged into that hill with the exhaust roaring fit to beat the rusted, burned stack from her. She spat cinders and smoke high into the air and the steam clouds from leaking gaskets enveloped Elliott, curling about him, shutting off his view. They were slowing, now. The roaring drum of the exhaust had dropped now to a sharp panting.

They were half-way up before he touched the reserve lever. He let it down slowly, a notch at a time, using every last inch of the momentum he had gained. Up, now, three-quarters of the way. Ben could see the rails on the bit of level going at the top. Up another train's length, slowing with each foot gained. Afar off, across the snow-blanketed country, a plume of white vapor trailed a break in the forests. That was the local, crossing the river, swinging in toward his siding.

"Go it, girl! Go it, girl!" he yelled at the engine, swinging one fist.

She shoved her nose over the crest, seeming to weave it from side as in distress. Her drivers slipped and spun a half turn; caught on sand, held. She began a stuttering, dying puff. The sound wavered. She seemed to stop. . . and cleared her cylinders with a short belch. . . .

She was on top. Her last breath had turned the trick.

"Hold to it, old timer! Hold to it!" Ben croaked.

The first car gained the crest. The locomotive was on the down grade, now; the second car coming across the peak. The third car rumbled over the top and Tim Jeffers, dropping his peavey, wormed along the logs and flopped down to the brake wheel as Ben shut her off, set the brakes and with a boyish swing of one arm yanked on the whistle cord to set her voice screaming.

Back on the last car Tim clubbed brake wheels. Out on the first, Ben Elliott drove the shoe home. The ancient locomotive dug her heels in and settled back. Down and down they went on the frost slick steel, gathering speed that was as alarming as the slowing of their pace had been a moment before. But with every train length traveled Tim Jeffers was setting more brakes against the humming wheels.

She slid, she slipped, she squealed and complained and clattered her way down that final mile. They had her under control at last and slowly they edged around the curve at the millpond, out onto the siding and to a full stop.

Ben, dropping down, ran across to the main line and held up his hand. Half a mile down the track the local puffed in toward him. The whistle sent up its cloud of steam at his signal, he heard the engineer shutting off and in minutes the train slid in, brakes grinding.

"That stuff go?" the conductor called, swinging down from the way car.

"That stuff goes!" Ben said almost reverently and turned to face Tim who was filling his pipe with unsteady hands.

It was a moment for the right word. But Tim Jeffers was not a man of words; not of many words.

"Well, you done it," he said simply.

"Yeah. With your help."

"Still needin' a camp boss?"

"Badly!"

"S'pose I'd do?"

"Do! Lord, Tim, if—"

"All right. I'm hired to get out logs again. Guess I'll hit Mr. Buller for a cuppa carfee. I've rode trains now 'nd again, Ben, but of all the rides I've ever took that was what you might call th' dangdest!"

* * * * * * *

In a Minnesota lumber town a bearded man sat near the stove in a small hotel and heard the story of what was happening in distant Tincup.

"Know him?" another listener asked the narrator.

"Not the kid. I know Brandon, 'nd I know Tim Jeffers. Top loaded for him three winters. If Tim's back there's a hot scrap on and . . . gosh! but I like scraps."

"Mean you're pulling for Tincup?"

"I'll say I am!"

The bearded man cleared his throat.

"You think, then, that the lad's got a chance of making it against Brandon?" he asked.

"It sure looks as if he had a chance. With old Tincup shanty boys hitting back for their stamping grounds his chances are getting better. Ever been in Tincup, Martin?"

The other closed the blade of his pocket knife and pulled at the lobe of his left ear with his right hand.

"I've heard of the place," he said quietly.

"Better hoist your turkey and come along with me. Likely he could find a place for a good bookkeeper."

Martin smiled oddly but made no other response.

In far flung camps and mill towns the story was being repeated, just such men were leaving jobs and turning their faces toward Tincup, known through the Lake states for the tyranny that Nicholas Brandon had exercised there so many years.

Ben, sitting with his feet on Able's desk in the justice's office, grinned broadly as he told of the latest developments on the job.

"Sixty-four men in camp this morning," he said. "Over thirty of 'em new and the best looking bunch of loggers I've seen since I was a kid."

Able glanced at a letter he had been holding.

"And with the Milwaukee people standing ready to finance us it looks as if you might, maybe, perhaps be getting ready to find it all down hill and shady, Ben. I think that interesting this particular bank is the best piece of work you've done yet."

"Nothing, Able. All I had to show was what we were doing. They can't lose with the lumber behind their notes."

"Unless Brandon finds a way.

"You've got to watch every loophole. Benny. And you've got too much for one man to do."

"Oh, it's not that bad. Things are straightening out. Tim's a wonder; Buller isn't missing a bet. We ought to keep right on stepping."

Ben rose to go and, as he did so, the door opened and Dawn McManus stepped in out of the lightly falling snow.

"Oh!" she cried in surprise. It was the first time she had seen Ben since that morning a month ago when he took the veneer logs on their mad ride to save the Hoot Owl operation from immediate insolvency. "Am I interrupting?"

"Come in, Dawn," said Able, rising.

And Elliott said: "If you are, it's nice to be interrupted."

She looked at him and, at first, her eyes held that coolness which was almost hostility but this melted and she smiled.

"You say nice things, Ben Elliott!"

"How can anyone help saying nice things to nice people?"

She made a playful mouth at him and Ben, watching her as she advanced to Able's desk, thought again that he never had supposed women grew to such loveliness.

Her errand with the old justice was brief. She and Ben went out together, Dawn on her way home, Ben to finish his errands in town.

At the corner where their ways parted they stopped and Dawn hesitated in what she had been saying. Then, looking into his face, she asked.

"Does Mr. Ben Elliott ever take tea with a young woman? You know, I am beginning to think that I like to talk to you!"

"Then the risk of having it reported that I'm a lounge lizard is as nothing."

The house where Dawn lived was the house in which she had been born, a sprawling white frame structure beneath whispering hemlocks. She led Ben into a long, low room, with wide, low windows, where a fire burned on an open hearth.

The fine odor of baking bread permeated the place and as they entered Dawn lifted her voice in a light hail:

"Oh-ho, Aunt Em!"

Sounds came from the rear; a door opened and closed, and then another door opened which gave into the room where they stood, and an ample woman in a checked apron, her face flushed as by stove heat, entered hastily.

"Yes, dearie— Well!"—stopping in surprise.

"Aunt Em, this is Mr. Elliott."

"How d'y do!" Her voice was full and deep, like a man's. "I've seen you, young man, and if I was a hand to say what most folks say I'd tell you that I feel like we're old friends." She shook hands vigorously. "You're a big young feller, Ben Elliott!"—eyeing him up and down.

Dawn laughed again as she drew off her coat.

"Don't you tell a soul, Aunt Em, but we are going to have tea! If his shanty boys ever heard about it they might think he was too much civilized for them."

"Pshaw! As if what other folks think counts!" She looked narrowly at Dawn and Ben saw the girl's face change. "It's what I've told Dawn ever since she was little, Ben, that it's what you think about your own self that matters; not what anybody else thinks. Well! You two set and I'll get tea."

She hurried out and Ben drew up a comfortable chair before the fire.

In the half hour that elapsed before the older woman returned Ben learned much about Dawn McManus. This was her house, her home. Aunt Em, then a young woman, had been housekeeper there after Dawn's mother died. She had stayed on, keeping the place up through the years that Dawn was away at school, making a living for herself by baking, and now that Dawn was home again she was the girl's closest friend and only confidant.

"There are so many people here now who are not . . . No, I'll put it the other way: I'm not congenial company for many people in this country. It isn't their fault. It's wholly mine." Her manner, which had been easy, began to stiffen a bit, Ben thought, as though she steeled herself for an ordeal.

"People have a right to their opinions, of course. Evidence was strong against my father. But he was no killer. He never harmed anyone. I'm sure of that. When people think of him as alive and a fugitive or dead and disgraced it stirs my temper! You've heard about my father."

"Of course."

"Naturally, you would."

They talked, after that, of personal tastes, of the glories of big country, of the limited recreations offered by little towns.

"Just the movie! Now and then there's a dance," the girl said, "but none of the boys seem to want to take me. . . . It is my fault, likely." She was staring moodily into the fire. "I frighten them away. Mr. Brandon asks me to go to the movie now and then but . . . I don't know . . ."

"So Brandon wants to amuse you, does he?"

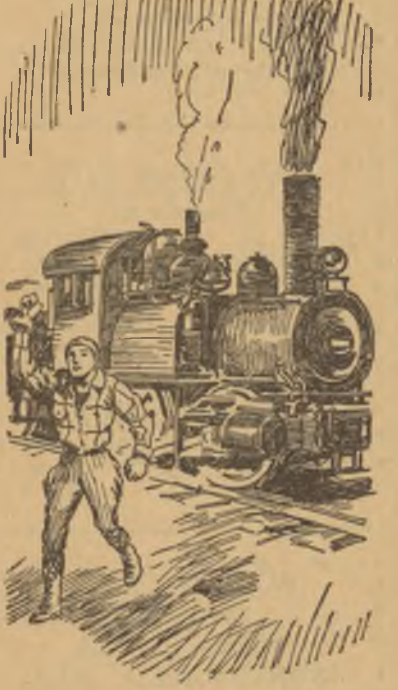
"Yes. He's been awfully kind to me, always. Of course, I know that Able and a lot of people think he's after the Hoot Owl and is quite ruthless about it but they can prove nothing. He was so good to me when I was little and talks so reasonably to me now that I can't believe their suspicions are well founded. Still . . . Things do seem to happen at Hoot Owl. Mr. Brandon's explanation of the fire and dynamiting is that you made an enemy of Bull Duval and his friends and that they are striking back for spite. That sounds reasonable, doesn't it?"

"Yes," said Ben, unwilling to argue any such point with her.

At this juncture Aunt Em came in with food that was surpassingly fine and for an hour they sat and talked while darkness fell.

Ben was rising to go when the doorbell rang. Aunt Em went to answer the summons and as a man's voice sounded in the hallway Dawn broke short what she had started to say. A moment later Nicholas Brandon entered the room.

The man's face, as he crossed the threshold and saw Ben, was a study. Lights flickered in his black eyes, a faint flush whipped up over his dead white cheeks and he opened his lips as in a light gasp of surprise or else preparatory to sharp speech.



Half a Mile Down the Track the Local Puffed in Toward Him.

But he gathered himself on the instant, moved directly to Dawn and with an even, kindly tone greeted her.

The girl turned as Brandon still held her hand and Ben thought she was moving it gently for release.

"Mr. Elliott, I think you must know Mr. Brandon." Ben bowed, a bit stiffly.

"Yes," he said. "Yes. I met him once."

Then Nicholas Brandon did an amazing thing, which went far in explaining Dawn's skepticism of the town's attitude toward him to Elliott. He laughed. He laughed easily, naturally, and in the laughter was an admission of embarrassment which rang true.

"Indeed we have! Under different circumstances! How are you today, Elliott?" He advanced and extended his hand still smiling and Ben was so amazed that mechanically he accepted it. "Yes, we've met before,"—turning to Dawn and Aunt Em—"under quite distressing circumstances. We met on unfriendly ground and both lost our heads a little. I hope Mr. Elliott doesn't harbor any resentment. As far as I'm concerned I've only regret for the affair!"

Friendly Potato Is Not Appreciated, Expert Says

One of the very best foods, the potato, is not fully appreciated, asserts an agricultural expert. For the human body to function properly, starches and sugars are required to produce energy or fuel; proteins to develop tissue; minerals and other dietary essentials, such as vitamins. Potatoes meet the ideal requirements for the body by producing a large amount of energy, some protein, a fair amount of minerals and an adequate assortment of essential vitamins, as well as supplying bulk. The potato is probably our best staple food and one which should fill a much larger place in our diet.

Many persons avoid potatoes because of their supposed fattening properties. This popular prejudice has little foundation in scientific fact. The potato, like any other food stuff is fattening only when eaten in a quantity more than sufficient to meet the body needs. The potato is no more fattening than the same amount of bread or any other cereal. History as well as geography shows that those people whose diet contains a large proportion of potatoes enjoy good health. In Ireland and Germany, where potatoes are widely and largely used, the health and stamina of the people is good and the death rate low.

The Panther

The term panther is used to refer either to the spotted leopard of the Old world or to the mountain lion or puma of the New world. These cats are about the same size and adult specimens weigh between 200 and 300 pounds.

War? Who Knows?
Strange Hanging
How Old Is Graft?
What Are Life and Death?

Arthur Brisbane

Lloyd George says there will be no war "this time," but some in Europe do not agree. Mussolini wants France and England to join him in an agreement to suppress any outbreak affecting them.

France is said to have moved troops for defense to the German frontier, although it is hard to guess what those troops could do. If Germany declared war it would be with planes dropping explosives and poison gas on Paris. No nation at war will sit in trenches for four or five years, now that flying is real.

Britain, going a long way around, wisely, sends a suave statesman, Captain Eden, to Moscow to see Stalin of Russia. The talk, not published, may have been like this:

If England agrees to help you fight Japan, will you help against Germany, in case of need?

A British naval officer cut the throat of a shipmate. In England they hang you for that. When hanging time came, Mrs. Violet Vandereist, prosperous widow, opposed to the death penalty, hired two planes to fly back and forth above the gallows, trailing banners reading, "Stop the death sentence."

While airplanes flew overhead, trucks drove back and forth before the jail, with loud speakers bellowing "Abide With Me."

The man that "killed his comrade sleeping," or however he did it, did not "abide." He went through the trap.

The British believe in discouraging murder, and prompt punishment seems to do it.

Graft and dishonesty are old, as old as human need and cunning. A papyrus written 1,200 years before Christ tells of three men tried for robbing a royal tomb. Egyptian kings were descended from the gods; to rob their tombs was sacrilege, the punishment death.

A dishonest jeweler, putting base metal in a supposedly "pure gold" crown for King Hiero, was exposed by the great Archimedes, who thought out a method in his bath, and started the word "eureka" down through the ages.

Michael Angelo, building St. Peter's at Rome, complained to the pope of the materials furnished by contractors, reminding his holiness that he, Michael Angelo, would make no profit from St. Peter's except "benefit to my soul," and urged the pope to punish the grafters. There is even graft now in this modern, enlightened republic.

What is life? What is death? What are we?

An English gentleman "dies"; doctors pronounce him dead. He returns to life, says he has been in heaven, tells what he saw—a dull account, clothing the same as we wear here. How far, how fast, did his spirit travel while he was "dead"?

What does the soul do while the body is supposedly dead? Does it go away and come back, or just wait around inside the body? What is death? Some say it is only a "belief," and there is no such thing.

In New York's American Museum of Natural History is shown a drawing of the largest land mammal that ever lived, named Baluchiterium. This huge animal, which vanished from earth 25,000,000 years ago, stood 17 feet 9 inches high at the shoulder, was as big as two big elephants, weighed 20,000 pounds or more. It was not as big as a dinosaur, but the dinosaur laid eggs and was no mammal. A food problem might be solved if the "biggest mammal" could be brought back and raised by cattlemen. It ate 500 pounds of food a day; that must be considered. In America it might be necessary to drown the mammal Baluchiterium, with her unborn babies.

Sir John Simon, returning from an unsatisfactory talk with Hitler, reports "certain divergencies" of opinion. That is going pretty far for a British statesman. There is a bigger fly than that in the ointment: Sir John learns from Hitler that Germany "already has a larger air force than that of Great Britain." Britain thought Germany had only half as many planes. A wise statesman gets his fighting airplanes ready before he starts to fight.

In France three persons "sterilized" at their own request by "a mysterious Austrian doctor" because they did not want to have children have been arrested.

France, striving for more population, believes that "sterilization" can be overdone.

The mysterious Austrian performed 15 operations on men and women before disappearing.

A Thousand Times No to Requests for Free Seeds

Washington.—For twelve years the United States Department of Agriculture has been trying to convince 100,000,000 people that it has no free seeds or plants. Yet each year as spring approaches, thousands of requests pour in from farms, suburbs and penthouses. And they are met with disappointment.

Years ago—previous to 1923—there was an annual appropriation for free seeds for congressional distribution through the Department of Agriculture. But in 1923 the government decided to discontinue the distribution of this great quantity of seed since it was only commercial garden seed such as could be bought from any good seed house and did not necessarily represent varieties better than those in common use.

Not only does the Department of Agriculture have no free seed, it has no seeds or plants for sale, either.

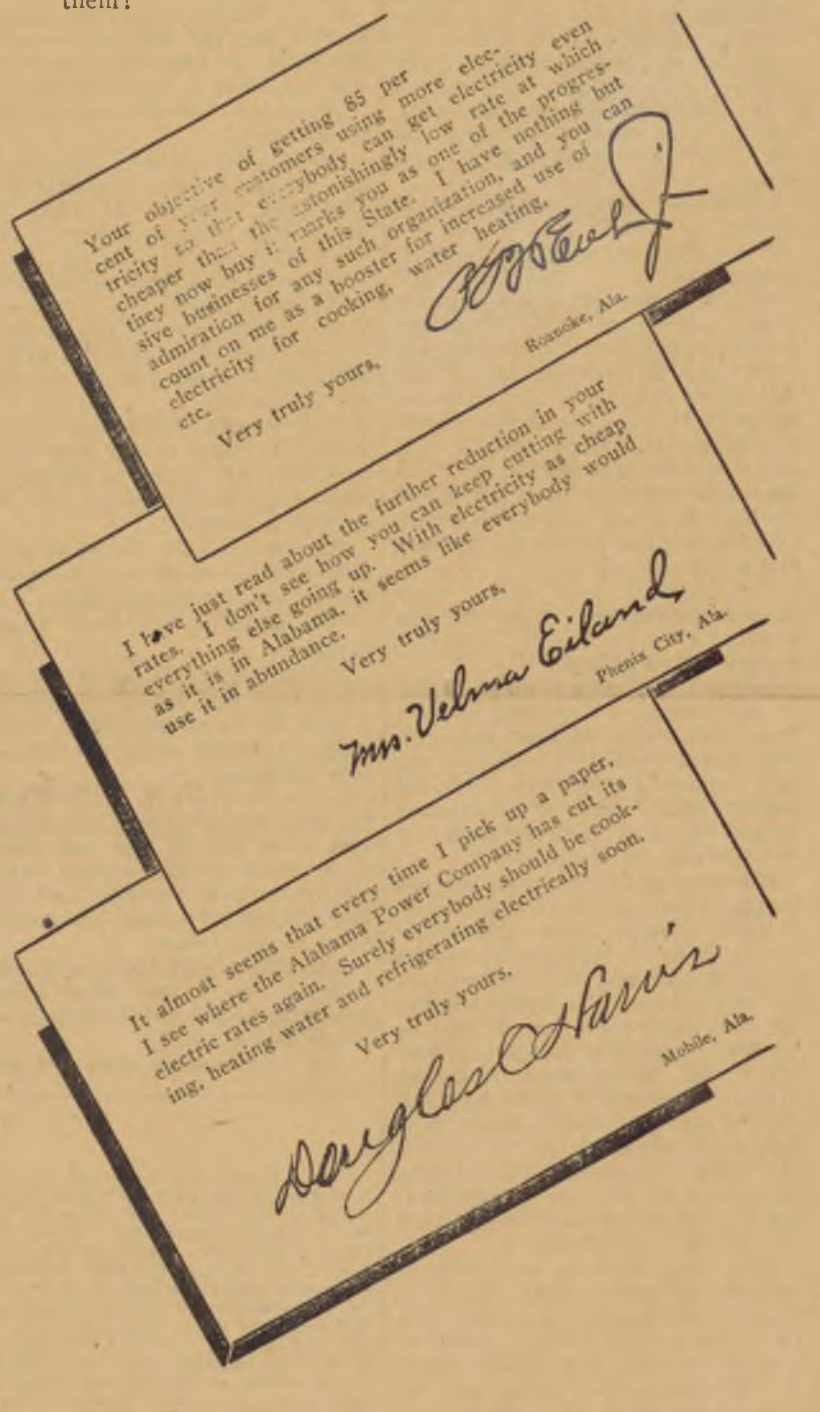
"LEND ME YOUR EAR!"

—says Reddy Kilowatt, "and let me tell you some more of the things people are writing my Company about. Here are three letters I've just received, from Mr. P. B. Trent, Jr., of Roanoke; Mrs. Velma Eiland, of Phenix City; and Mr. Douglas C. Harris, of Mobile. Read them!"



Your objective of getting 85 per cent of your customers using more electricity so that everybody can get electricity even cheaper than the astonishingly low rate at which they now buy it marks you as one of the progressive businesses of this State. I have nothing but admiration for any such organization, and you can count on me as a booster for increased use of electricity for cooking, water heating, etc.

Very truly yours,

Roanoke, Ala.

I have just read about the further reduction in your rates. I don't see how you can keep cutting with everything else going up. With electricity as cheap as it is in Alabama, it seems like everybody would use it in abundance.

Very truly yours,

Mrs. Velma Eiland

It almost seems that every time I pick up a paper, I see where the Alabama Power Company has cut its electric rates again. Surely everybody should be cooking, heating water and refrigerating electrically soon.

Coach Wants Musicians for Football Passers

Madison, Wis.—When a coach asks a prospective center if he is a musician, the coach is not as crazy as the candidate might suspect, Dr. Clarence W. Spears, head football coach at the University of Wisconsin, revealed here.

A knowledge of music is a valuable asset to a good center, Spears explained. In addition to big hands and ability to pass accurately, a sense of rhythm and timing is one of the most essential qualifications of a center, the coach said.

The center position is the most important on the team. Spears said, because his pass initiates every play and a bad pass makes the play at least 33⅓ per cent inefficient.

Two Invalids Swamped by Offers of Advice

Some of the letters express sympathy. Others extend self-appointed advice on how to cure the disease which doctors have called incurable.

A message from Texas tells how "a pretty girl was saved from turning to stone" by a diet. An Illinois woman who was "similarly afflicted 30 years ago" says she was cured by herbs.

A New York man writes, "I have in my power to completely cure this dread disease but lack the carfare to come to Muncie." A New York astrologer believes that he could help. Letters from faith healers are numerous.

Worry Over Automobile Accident Kills Driver

This was revealed as Police Judge Julius Kovachy wrote "abated by death" on the careless driving case against Gatson.

Gatson's automobile struck Mrs. Elizabeth Mayer, fifty-five, last September. He took her to Deaconness hospital, arranged to pay her bills. His case was continued in court several times, awaiting Mrs. Mayer's release from the hospital to testify.

Meanwhile worry over the accident sent Gatson himself to the hospital several weeks ago. Recently he was released, but a few days later he collapsed and died at his home.

Court Defines Legal Cruelty; Denies Divorce

Carson City, Nev.—The remark, "I made a d—n sight more money before I married you, anyway," doesn't constitute legal cruelty, although it is rude, the Nevada Supreme court ruled in reversing a divorce decree given Mrs. Agnes M. Neilsen from Perry A. Nielsen of Santa Maria, Calif.

"Mere austerity of temper, petulence of manner," the court continued, "rudeness of language, a want of civil attention and accommodation, even occasional sallies of passion, if they do not threaten bodily harm do not amount to legal cruelty."

Among Mrs. Neilsen's accusations to prove the charge of cruelty was that Nielsen told her several times, "You could stand to do a lot more work."

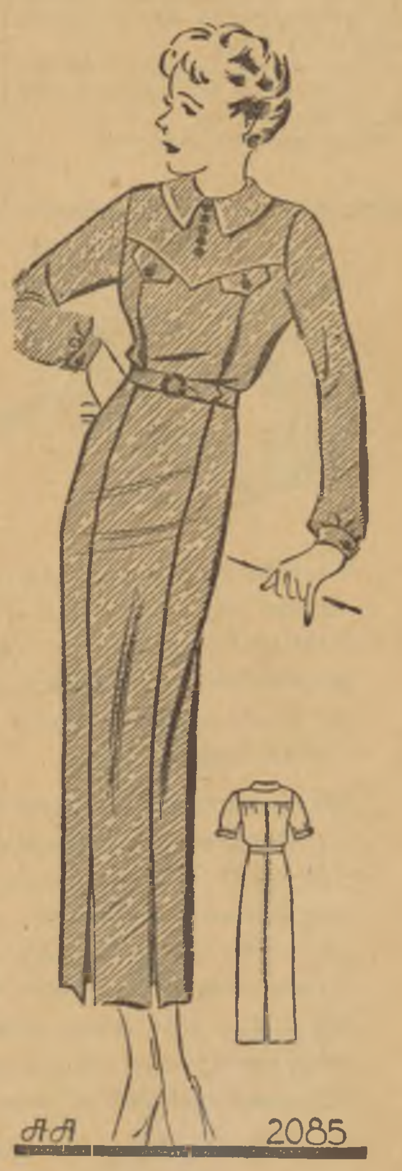
Smart for School or Work in Office

PATTERN 2085



When a girl leaves the house before nine every morning, whether she's off to school or to work, she needs at least one well-tailored frock in her wardrobe, one that will take her smartly through long busy hours and bring her home at night looking as freshly dressed as when she started. Designed along tailored lines, this frock adds a becoming "little boy" collar to its youthful yoke and tops its smart front bodice pleats with buttoned-down tabs that look for all the world like two perky little pockets. The skirt boasts a panel in front which ends in two inverted pleats, and there is another inverted pleat at the back. The full back gathered to the yoke is the last word in chic.

Pattern 2085 is available only in sizes 10, 12, 14, 16 and 18. Size 16 takes 2⅞ yards 54 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS 15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted
by William Bruckart

National Press Building   Washington, D. C.

Washington.—President Roosevelt has submitted to congress a list of the legislation he deems necessary to have passed before the present session adjourns. He has divided it into two categories—"must" and desirable. If congress enacts only the list of "must" legislation and passes over the other group of bills which the President considers desirable, it is made to appear that the membership of the house and senate is due to suffer some of the torrid temperature and the uncomfortable humidity of a Washington summer. The President said he must have legislation extending the National Recovery administration, providing social security, eliminating public utility holding companies, increasing the loaning power of the Home Owners Loan corporation, extension of the so-called nuisance taxes which expire by limitation of law on June 30, and revision of the banking laws.

Lays Out Work for Congress

In addition, the President made known that he would like to have enacted legislation to take the profits out of war, whatever that may mean. He previously had sent a message asking enactment of a law providing for expansion of the American merchant marine through the use of ship subsidies, and he also desires to have enacted legislation setting up machinery for the settlement of labor disputes. This legislation is in the congressional hopper in the form of a bill by Senator Wagner, of New York.

The President would like to have amendments to the agricultural adjustment act in order to eliminate some of the weaknesses which the AAA people admit exist. The airmail contract situation is another matter with which Mr. Roosevelt has been concerned.

Seasoned observers recognize that this list of "must" legislation, not to mention the desired legislation, is sufficient to keep congress grinding away far into the summer. They recognize likewise that if the desired legislation later becomes of such concern that the President wants to place it on the preferred list as well, the membership of congress must be prepared to forego summer trips of any kind.

* * *

Pets of Their Own

Since a good many members of congress have grown tired of being called rubber stamps for the administration, they naturally have turned attention to legislation which they think will be helpful to their own bailiwicks. to themselves personally or from a party standpoint. Thus there have been promoted numerous pieces of legislation for which some individuals, at least, entertain greater fervor than they do for measures that were drafted by President Roosevelt's official family and transmitted to congress as administration legislation. It is the general observation that an individual, representative, or senator frequently will go much further in fighting for legislation that is his own brain child than for legislation placed before him on a silver platter such as administration proposals have been. Consequently, individual or group measures are constantly cluttering up house and senate legislative calendars. This is a factor meaning delay for administration bills.

It is to be remembered, as has been reported in these columns, that Mr. Roosevelt is unable to ward off criticism of some of his proposals. Indeed, there have been Democratic criticisms and Democratic opposition to a greater or lesser degree to all of the legislation he has proposed since congress convened last January. All of which is by way of saying that congress faces weeks of committee work and floor debate despite the fact that the house Democratic leaders still retain rather solid control of a sufficient majority in the lower house of congress to drive through any pet measures for the administration. In the senate the situation is decidedly different.

Included in the legislation being fostered by individual members is the bill that would permit cabinet officers to appear on the floors of congress for questioning and explanation, such as occurs under the British and French parliamentary systems. The administration does not want this bill. It will have to exert some pressure to avoid passage. The reason is that the Roosevelt administration is no longer one in which the cabinet is dominant. Cabinet officers are only part of the scheme, and if congress wanted to inquire about the handling of relief money, which it probably will desire, it must talk with Administrator Hopkins. Mr. Hopkins is not in the cabinet. The same is true of NRA and to some extent to the AAA, although Secretary Wallace of the Department of Agriculture theoretically is a superior officer to Administrator Davis. The administrator is definitely opposed to the passage of bonus legislation for the former soldiers, sailors and marines and it looks like a Presidential veto will be necessary there. The same is true of inflationary proposals of which there are many. The situation is one, therefore, in which Mr. Roosevelt must be constantly on his guard to prevent action which he does not want as well as being fortified at all times with pressure to put through the legislation he has described as necessary. Thus it is seen he is confronted with many complications which did not disturb him in the first two sessions of New Deal congresses and these complications mean a longer life for the current session.

* * *

Some "Must" Legislation

Let us examine the status of the legislation which the President said must be passed. The outlook is something like this:

The extension of the National Recovery administration is still far off. Senate hearings are just ended and the house is still further behind. No action can be expected in either body for several weeks. The present law expires June 16.

Recently Mr. Roosevelt sent to congress a very bitter message denouncing public utility holding companies and demanding legislation eliminating them from our economic structure. The house committee considering this legislation is just winding up its hearings and the senate committee which will have jurisdiction has taken no action at all. It must be said that a hard fight is in prospect if and when this legislation reaches the stage of debate because investors in these companies are not going to have their equities destroyed while they sit idly by. These investors are doing more now than just making faces at congress and the volume of letters which members are receiving in opposition to the holding companies legislation transcends anything that ever has happened in the memory of this correspondent.

The banking legislation which Mr. Roosevelt has proposed, or which was proposed for him by Governor Eccles, the New Deal and radical governor of the federal reserve board is faced with opposition equally as bitter and as well organized as that confronting the holding companies bill. Perhaps it can be said that opposition to the banking legislation is even stronger because in that fight the President will be opposed by Senator Carter Glass of Virginia, who must be regarded as the most virulent of all the Democrats in the senate. The house banking committee has about done its job with hearings on this bill but the senate committee where the full force of the Glass opposition will be felt has not even set a date for committee consideration.

The social security bill about which Mr. Roosevelt has done much talking, because it is distinctly a reform measure, has finally been redrafted in the house while senate leadership is unable to get together on any policy respecting it. Some senators want to split up this bill and pass the section providing for old age pensions, allowing the other parts of the bill to die a slow death.

The legislation to increase by $1,750,000,000 the loaning power of the Home Owners Loan corporation probably will get through the senate without much more ado. The house passed the bill because it could not do otherwise with individual members realizing that there was a chance that some of this money would go into their particular districts. Included in this bill is a line that promises a good many hundred jobs for politicians and it is natural that the party in power is not going to overlook this possibility.

There remains on the "must" list, then, only the proposal to extend the nuisance taxes which expire at the end of June. It is probable that the bulk of these levies will be accepted by congress as necessary.

* * *

About the Future

One cannot fail, in tramping around Washington these days, to note the frequent expressions concerning the outlook for the New Deal and for President Roosevelt's personal political future. In fact, some hardboiled observers lately have been heard to say that Mr. Roosevelt is suffering from too much ballyhoo. He was put up on a pedestal that made of him in the eyes of many persons something of a superman. He himself is regarded as having contributed to this condition by his many campaign promises, some of which he has found absolutely impractical as remedies in leading the country out of the morasses and on to a more satisfactory economic plain. In truth, the President's own political colleagues have continued to depict him as an individual capable of things which no human can accomplish and this combination of circumstances is declared by many keen minded persons as likely to bring, if indeed it has not already brought, a definitely bad political reaction from the President's standpoint.

It is still fresh in the minds of men and women throughout the country how President Hoover was over-advertised as a superior person in an administrative way. Mr. Hoover suffered from too much ballyhoo to an extent greater than any other man who has served as President with the possible exception of Woodrow Wilson. When the depression came and the current turned against Mr. Hoover he was utterly powerless. With a recalcitrant congress on his hands and a dissatisfied people, Mr. Hoover met the fate that must have been expected.

SHOT OF THYROID TO RESTORE PEP OF BUSINESS MAN

Business men are advised to get a dose of "brain oil" when they begin to slow down and lose their grip. They can get it from horses, pigs, lambs or other animals, and it will do just as much good as though it came from their own thyroid gland, Dr. George Crile, head of the famous Cleveland clinic explained.

Doctor Crile, in Kansas City for a regional meeting of the American College of Surgeons, gave the advice at a chamber of commerce luncheon.

The decrease in chemical and physical activity sets in at birth, Doctor Crile explained, and the activity of the brain depends on activity of the thyroid gland.

"When a deficient amount of this glandular product is secreted, and this is common in the second half of a business man's life, his brain begins to slow up and his associates notice a letting down in his work," Doctor Crile said. "He feels drowsy and dull in the afternoon. His business fails to hold its dominance among competitors. The activity of his essential organs is letting down.

"Then the man can take thyroid extract and his brain will be sharpened, just as it formerly was sharpened by his own thyroid hormone. It doesn't matter whose thyroid gland makes the extract given to him; it is exactly the same whether it comes from a pig, a lamb, a sheep, a horse, an ox or another man. Thus the lagging individual can be placed back in the saddle again."

FHA LOANS

MAY BE OBTAINED FOR ELECTRIC WATER SYSTEMS IN RURAL HOMES

Robt. Jemison, Jr., F. H. A. State Director, Outlines Method of Securing Money for this Purpose

"Those who live in suburban and rural homes can now enjoy the comforts and conveniences of running water in kitchen, laundry, bath room, barns and outbuildings through loans made under regulations of the Federal Housing Administration," according to Robt. Jemison, Jr., F. H. A. State Director.

By securing such a loan, an Electric Water System may be installed immediately, and paid for over a period of from 1 to 3 years, Mr. Jemison pointed out.

"For many years people living in suburban and rural sections were handicapped by the lack of running water. Obtaining sufficient water for stock, and the ordinary purposes of life, by the old-fashioned well bucket, or by working the handle of a pump was a slow, tedious job. In case of a fire, it was impossible to get enough water by these methods to offer much protection.

"Now—thanks to electricity and loans made under regulations of the Federal Housing Administration — these antiquated ways of obtaining water no longer need be relied upon. F. H. A. loans are making it possible for many thousands of people living in Alabama to install electric pumps, and the necessary plumbing, to give their families every advantage of 'city water.'"

With Alabama's bargain-rate electricity, modern automatic Electric Water Pumps will bring water from any source of supply—lake, stream, spring, cistern, shallow or deep well—and maintain a constant pressure day and night for only a few cents a week.

Wilbur B. Nolen, F. H. A. Associate State Director and Chairman of the Advisory Committee of rural housing program, pointed out that the way to secure an F. H. A. loan is to apply to any bank, banker, building materials or hardware dealer in the city where the person lives who wishes to receive the loan.

STATE GAME AND FISH DEPARTMENT SELF-SUPPORTING

Montgomery—Taking cognizance of a movement to turn all ear-marked funds into the general treasury of the state, I. T. Quinn, State Commissioner of Game and Fisheries, in a statement today said that his department had been self supporting since it was created in 1907 and that he would fight to keep his funds intact.

He recalled that the sportsmen and conservationists of the state rebelled against a similar proposal in 1932 and he predicted it would meet overwhelming opposition from them again.

"Since the Department of Game and Fisheries was organized in 1907 it has functioned in its special field of game and fish management, and the administration of laws relating thereto, without the expendiure of one penny of tax revenues," Commissioner Quinn declared. "The legislature of Alabama has widely provided fees from the sale of hunting, fishing and trapping licenses, and the use of revenues from the imposition of fines for game and fish violations, to finance the department.

"It would be manifestly unfair to take the contributions from sportsmen and conservationists and cover them into the general maw of the state treasury to pay the general operating expenses of the government. An attempt was made during the 1932 special session of the legislature to change the policy of the state rebelled against the idea and would do it again. And why not? They now have the privilege of making an annual contribution to the cause of conservation, but they would not, nor could they be expected to, should that contribution be covered into the general treasury to pay the general operating expenses of all the state's departmental activities."

Commissioner Quinn said the sportsmen-conservationists of Alabama do not ask, nor do they expect now or in the future for the legislature to make direct appropriations to supplement the revenues of the Game and Fish Fund, but "they do ask that the legislature make adequate provision for the department to collect sufficient revenue to prosecute a constructive program of conservation and development of the state's wildlife resources and thus guarantee to the thousands of citizens who annually seek recreation by hunting and fishing, a reasonable supply of game birds, animals and fish".

ANNUAL DEEP SEA FISHING RODEO

Mobile—The Alabama Deep Sea Fishing Rodeo Association has set up business headquarters at 17 North Water street an dissued its first call for boats for the state's seventh annual deep sea fishing rodeo.

The rodeo, one of the year's outstanding sports events, will be held July 22, 23 and 24 in Gulf waters of Dauphin Island, an historic fort site 30 miles southwest of Mobile. This is one month earlier than it has been held in the past and should guarantee more boats since the dates are in advance of the opening of the shrimping season.

As the call for boats went out to the Gulf fishermen, L. G. Adams, president of the association, moved into the new headquarters and announced that a meeting of the executive committee will be held shortly to plan for the 1935 tournament. He said the meeting will be attended by I. T. Quinn, state commissioner of game and fisheries, founder of the rodeo and chairman of its prize committee, which already has begun to assemble prizes.

Veteran coast fishermen point to their fishing calendars in support of their contention that July 22, 23 and 24 are just the days to catch Mr. and Mrs. Silver King at play in Mobile Bay. The rodeo officials believe that the earlier dates will result in a greater catch in all the species of fish for which rodeo prizes are offered and will enable more people to spend their vacation at the rodeo.

Last summer the rodeo was greeted with a record registration of 525 anglers and Mr. Adams predicts that the registration for the 1935 contest will exceed this mark. He said the association already has received many letters asking for boat reservations and that it is counting on at least twenty states being represented when the rodeo craft shove off for the fishing grounds at dawn July 22.

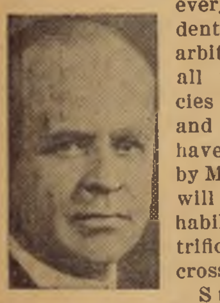
President Reveals Plans for Work Relief Program—Frank Walker His Chief Aid—Auto Workers Strike in Toledo.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.



Frank Walker

PLANS for spending the $4,880,000,000 work relief fund are being made rapidly, parts of the general scheme being revealed to the public almost every day. The President will be the final arbiter but practically all the federal agencies will participate and three new ones have been announced by Mr. Roosevelt. These will handle rural rehabilitation, rural electrification and grade crossing elimination.

Standing at the President's right hand is Frank C. Walker, former treasurer of the Democratic party. He has replaced Donald Richberg as chairman of the National Emergency council and is the head of a new division in that body known as the division of application and information. Under his direction all proposals will be sorted out and data on them from various government units will be co-ordinated. Then they will be handed on, with Mr. Walker's recommendations, to a new works allotment board which is headed by Secretary Harold Ickes. These two additions to the alphabet groups in Washington are known as DAI and WAB.

In a press conference the President named these eight types of work which will be undertaken, with the amount of money to be spent on each:

1. Highways, roads, streets, grade crossing elimination, and express highways, $800,000,000.
2. Rural rehabilitation, relief in stricken agricultural areas, water conservation, water diversion, irrigation, reclamation, rural industrial communities, and subsistence homesteads, $500,000,000.
3. Rural electrification, $100,000,000.
4. Housing, low cost housing in rural and urban areas, reconditioning, and remodeling, $450,000,000.
5. Assistance for educational, professional, and clerical persons and other "white collar" unemployed, $300,000,000.
6. Citizen Conservation corps, $600,000,000.
7. Sanitation, soil erosion, stream pollution, reforestation, flood control, rivers and harbors, $350,000,000.
8. Loans, grants, or both, to cities, counties, states, and other political subdivisions for public works, $900,000,000.

The rural rehabilitation work will be directed by Rexford G. Tugwell, under-secretary of agriculture, and he will not be responsible to Secretary Wallace but will have a free hand to carry out his schemes for moving families from marginal lands, shifting stranded industrial workers to new, planned rural communities and building cities outside of large urban centers to relieve slum congestion.

Asked as to how much was ready to be spent the President recalled that $600,000,000 already had been put forward for the CCC and that Public Works Administrator Harold L. Ickes had applications totaling more than $1,000,000,000.

In conclusion, the Chief Executive said that there was a tendency to make loans instead of grants wherever possible, the loans to be long-term ones at low interest rates.

Appointment of Mr. Walker leaves Mr. Richberg free, as the President said, to devote his time to the NRA during the period of pending legislation in congress and litigation in the Supreme court.

ORGANIZED labor opened its attempt to obtain recognition in the automobile industry with a strike of workers in the Toledo plant of the Chevrolet Motor company. The factory was closed down immediately, though only a part of the force joined in the strike. Union pickets were placed about it, but city police and deputy sheriffs were on hand to see that there was no disorder.

President Sloan of General Motors corporation issued this statement in New York.

"The vital question involved is whether General Motors corporation is willing to sign an agreement for a closed shop recognizing the local union as the exclusive representative of all the employees of the Toledo plant. This General Motors will not do."

The union, in a lengthy statement, said its committee "has done everything in its power to meet with the management and to secure an amicable and fair adjustment of the matter of wages, hours and union recognition and various other grievances.

"The management refused to sign a contract of any kind and flatly refused every section of the proposed contract with the exception of two minor points."

The company offered to make wage readjustments and give a 5 per cent general wage increase, show no discrimination against union men, and agreed to respect seniority rights as provided by the automobile labor board.

Secretary Perkins sent Thomas J. Williams, Labor department conciliator, to Toledo to see what might be done. President Green of the A. F. of L. said there was grave danger that the Toledo strike might spread to other automotive plants.

Leo C. Wollman, chairman of the National Automobile Labor board, reported that that body had completed a canvass of 163,150 workers in American automobile plants and found that 68.6 per cent of them showed no affiliation with any labor organization. The various employees' associations grouped together ranked second with 21,774 members, equal to 13.3 per cent of the total. The American Federation of Labor was third with 14,057, or 8.6 per cent, while the Associated Automobile Workers of America were fourth with 6,083, or 3.7 per cent. The remainder of the vote was split between the Mechanics Educational society and ten other unions.

Speaker Byrns

WITHOUT benefit of gag rule but with perfect party discipline, the administration's social security bill was jammed through the house substantially as President Roosevelt wants it. The final vote was 372 to 33. It may be some weeks before it is passed by the senate, for the senate finance committee, to which it was referred, is busy just now with NRA extension and veterans' bonus payment.

Leading features of the measure as passed by the house are:

Grants to states for old age assistance (pensions) on a 50-50 basis, but for no individual will the federal government's share exceed $15 per month.

Compulsory old age benefits for persons over sixty-five on basis of salary earned during working lifetime, payments ranging from $15 to $85 a month. Income tax on pay rolls of employees starting with 1 per cent in 1937 and graduated upward to 3 per cent in 1949; excise tax on employers in same amounts. This will mean a total pay roll tax of 6 per cent by 1949.

Unemployment insurance. Tax on employer of 1 per cent on pay rolls in 1936, 2 per cent for 1937, and 3 per cent thereafter.

Social security board as new bureau of government in the executive branch with three members appointed by the President.

Federal grants to states for maternal and child health service, an appropriation of $3,800,000.

Federal grants to states for public health service, an appropriation of $8,000,000.

Speaker Byrns and other majority leaders were elated by the immense majority by which the bill carried because, as they asserted, it was put through without any pressure from the White House. Mr. Byrns said: "We got no orders from the President, so help me Almighty God."

M. W. Clement

GEN. W. W. ATTERBURY, veteran official of the Pennsylvania railroad, has retired as president of the company eight months before that would have been necessary under its regulations, because of ill health. The directors unanimously elected Martin W. Clement to succeed him. The new president of the great system was born 53 years ago in Sunbury, Pa., and entered the service of the road in 1901 as a rodman. His promotion was steady and nine years ago he became the vice president.

General Atterbury had this to say of his successor:

"Since he became vice president, Clement has been intimately associated with me in conducting the company's affairs and in our relations with the other railroads and with the government.

"The remarkable results achieved by the company last year, one of the most difficult periods the railroad has ever experienced, were largely due to Clement's leadership. His manifest capabilities have commended him not only to his associate directors and officers, but also to the executives of other railroads with whom he has been working in recent years in the interest of the railroad industry as a whole.

"Moreover, he enjoys the confidence, respect and co-operation of the entire Pennsylvania railroad organization."

MORE than three thousand persons lost their lives in a series of earthquake shocks that occurred in the most thickly populated section of Formosa, the island off the Chinese coast which Japan acquired in 1895. It was the worst disaster of the kind in the Orient since the Tokyo-Yokohama quake of 1923. The number of injured was estimated at fully 12,000, and a quarter of a million were rendered homeless. Property damage was placed at $28,000,000. Half a dozen sizable towns and many villages were completely destroyed, and fires and heavy rain added to the dangers and distress of the afflicted people.

FATHER COUGHLIN, the "radio priest" of Detroit, staged the first state meeting of his National Union for Social Justice in Olympia stadium in his home town, and more than 150,000 enthusiastic supporters crowded into the edifice to hear him tell how he proposed to right the wrongs of the people. On the platform with the crusading cleric were Senators Elmer Thomas of Oklahoma and Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota, and Representatives William Connery of Massachusetts, Martin L. Sweeney of Ohio, Thomas O'Malley of Wisconsin and William Lemke of North Dakota.

The priest put forward the National union as a definite political weapon aimed at the money power and at standpat partyism.

Father Coughlin has been endorsed by the bishop of Detroit, Rt. Rev. Michael Gallegher.

"I pronounce Father Coughlin sound in doctrine, able in its application and interpretation," the bishop said. "Freely I give him my imprimatur on his written word and freely I give my approval on the spoken word. May both be circulated without objection throughout the land. Under my jurisdiction he preaches the just codes of the old law and its commandments. Until a lawful superior rules otherwise, I stand steadfastly behind this priest, Father Coughlin, encouraging him to do the will of God as he sees it and I see it."

GOVERNOR TALMADGE of Georgia, one of the most vociferous Democratic denouncers of President Roosevelt and the New Deal, has a strong supporter in Tom Linder, the Georgia commissioner of agriculture. In the department's official farm bulletin, that gentleman sent to the farmers of the state a message that "we still have the right to secede" from the Union.

The statement was carried in a footnote to a long article written by Linder in which he drew a comparison between the Democratic administration in Washington and the Russian government.

The secession reference was in the nature of resentment against a recent ruling by the United States Supreme court reversing Alabama courts in the Scottsboro case on the ground colored citizens were excluded from juries.

Senator Long

SENATOR HUEY LONG delivered his much advertised attack on the President and the administration before a crowd that jammed the senate chamber. He was limited to 40 minutes, but in that time he used a lot of language. After describing Ickes, Farley, Wallace and General Johnson in terms not very funny, the "Kingfish" assailed Mr. Roosevelt as personally responsible for what he called a plan to force the state of Louisiana to yield to corruption and debauchery. He threatened a tax rebellion in his realm if there were further federal encroachments in the matter of controlling the expenditure of federal loans for state projects.

Huey charged that the administration was concerned solely with controlling the expenditures in Louisiana in such manner as to insure winning the election in 1936.

"They could go down there and spend the whole five billion and they could not win that election," he said.

Senator Long now indicates that he has no desire to head a third party next year unless that should be necessary to bring about the defeat of President Roosevelt. He says he would gladly join with the Republicans if they would nominate Senator Borah.

UNDER a new law the German Nazis are suppressing the entire church press of the country, Catholic and Protestant, and also all Jewish organs, either religious or racial. The edict, signed by Max Amann, president of the reich press chamber and manager of the Nazi party's publishing organization, is designed to monopolize the reich's publications for Nazi ideas and make them legally subject to Nazi dictatorship.

The law provides that "church or professional newspapers as well as papers intended for groups of subscribers with certain interests, henceforth are forbidden." The Nazi party and its organizations are not subject to the new law.

King George

KING GEORGE of England, it appears, had no desire for an elaborate and costly celebration of his silver jubilee, such as was planned by the cabinet committee, and now he and Prime Minister MacDonald have ordered that the affair shall be very "quiet." His majesty was not consulted at first, and when he heard there were strong protests from the northern shires especially against such a wasteful expenditure of money in hard times, he was exceedingly irate and wanted to call off the whole affair. This could not be done, but the celebration will be nothing like what the cabinet committee had intended.

The king has forbidden garter king at arms, the duke of Norfolk, and other high officers of state of the ceremonial department to have anything to do with the jubilee. He has refused to have the peers of the realm in their robes for the presentation of addresses from the houses of parliament. He has refused to robe himself for the occasion.

Plan Pharos of Columbus

Move to Create Monument to Great Sailor in World He Discovered; Island of Havti Selected as the Most Appropriate Site.

Some brief descriptions have come down to us about one of the Seven Wonders of the ancient world, the Lighthouse of Alexandria.

It was built on the island of Pharos in the harbor and was connected with the city by the Seven Furlong bridge. Accounts placing the height of its tower at 600 feet are believed to be overdrawn and 400 feet is regarded as more probable. Built by Sostratus of Cnidus, it was begun under Ptolemy I of Egypt and was finished under Ptolemy II, its cost being placed at 800 talents, which by some valuations might be the equivalent of as much as $1,600,000.

From the Pharos of Alexandria is traced an addition to languages and an influence on lighthouse and also on other architecture. The word Pharos came to be applied to lighthouses generally and with some change in spelling is of common usage in certain modern tongues, while pharology became a technical term for lighthouse building. The first of the lighthouses in western Europe, built by the Romans, was called the Pharos of Dover, while the minarets of Mohammedan mosques symbolize lighthouses and in the earlier ones we possibly may see what their model, the original Alexandria structure, looked like. Some influence on the steeples of Christian churches is discerned by writers.

An example of special dignity and worthiness is accordingly followed in elaborate plans for creating, in the western hemisphere, a like wonder of the modern world in a monument to Christopher Columbus. Its site will not be at any modern Alexandria—at any of the great ports of the New world he discovered, but on the island of Hayti, on which he landed during his very first voyage, where he established the first American colony and where his remains were buried in 1536, 30 years after his death. During the partial occupany of that island by Americans of late the project has been advanced to a stage where success seems certain.

If the plan is carried out as contemplated, no other undertaking will be representative of the New world in as complete a sense, for it is proposed that every western national government, large or small, shall contribute to its $2,000,000 cost. A design for a noble structure has already been made, embodying special precautions against a Caribbean peril, the original Pharos having been destroyed by an earthquake in the Thirteenth century.

To some it will seem important to know whether the remains of Columbus still rest in the ancient cathedral of Santo Domingo, in the island's second republic, and some recent works of reference print as authoritative the version of the Spanish government as to their removal years ago. The bare statement that the wrong tomb was opened and the bones of one of Columbus' sons taken away, and not those of Columbus himself, does not seem very convincing, but if the data preserved by those called in as observers during an examination at the cathedral some years ago are accurate, a mistake was made by the Spanish. Insignia, lettering, other small evidences indicated that the tomb which had been opened was undoubtedly that of the son and that another tomb now holds the few fragments of Columbus' bones and the observers were men of intelligence, including high ecclesiastics, officials and others.

But whether or not their opinion was correct, this is an appropriate site for many other reasons, and what could be a more appropriate form for a monument to the greatest navigator of all than a splendid pinnacle carrying a perpetual light for the guidance of his successors on the seas? This will be more than a flame seen afar for directing those who ply the ocean. It is also designed for those plying the upper air. Aviation is now farther advanced than was the lore of the sea in Columbus' time. Probably air routes along the short parallels of latitude in the inclement North will always be followed, but distance is much less important than safety to aviation, making miles by the hundreds in an hour.

May we not believe that the favorite routes of the future will be along the warmer, milder, safer parallels to our southern ports; that the skies to be "whitened" by flying craft will be skies to the south and that the Pharos of Columbus, looked for by many an eye on dark nights and stormy nights, will be a wonder and preserver vouchsafing in the Caribbean blessings to the imperiled greater even than those of its predecessor of the Mediterranean.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Rubber Turf for Racers

Tested at a stadium near London, rubber turf is being used to surface the track on which greyhounds race. It is claimed that the material gives better footing after a rain than grass. The rubber turf also will be tested on football fields.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Russian Auto-Sleigh

A worker in the Molotow automobile factory of Russia has invented an auto-sleigh that runs on spokes or feet instead of wheels, and instead of wheels at the back there are two pairs of skiis that move along special grooves in the chassis and then press at the snow and shove the car along.

—14—

"What's the difficulty, Brandon? Didn't you expect to see me this morning?"

"Why . . . I . . . That is, I thought—"

Ben stepped close and dropped his voice nearly to a whisper.

"You thought I wouldn't be walking today? Was that it?"

"Not walking? I don't know what you're talking about." The older man's self-control was coming back rapidly, now that his fright had passed away.

"I just came in to get matters straight between us, Brandon. Several serious things have happened to the Hoot Owl but in spite of them the Hoot Owl is booming; now, I presume, I can look for things to happen to me. Before anything does—because I'm not rash enough to be cocksure that it won't—I want you to get me straight."

The last vestige of his smile was gone by then. He stood spread-legged, hands locked behind his back, eyes boring into Brandon's gaze.

"I'm not interested in—"

"But you'll listen! You'll listen or I'll choke you until you'll beg for the opportunity to listen, Brandon! You'll listen to me this morning and it'll be the first and last time.

"I know a great deal. I can prove but little. I know that you started in to run me out by sending Duval to clean up my camp. Next, you tried to cripple my operation by having a firebug touch off the mill. Next, you or some of your men stole a piston head out of the express—"

"Don't go too far, young man!"

"I won't. The pits of h—l are the inside limits for you, Brandon!

"After that, you timed it nicely and blew up my trestle. You almost had us two or three times. But you flopped! The Hoot Owl is up on its knees, will be on its feet in a month if we keep going, and it'll be sitting on the world by the time breakup hits us. All you've done to the job has only helped it.

"That's that! Next you try to get me, thinking, probably, that if you knock the skipper off the bridge the craft will founder for certain. You're wrong, there. You can't lick my men, because they're too many for you; you can't stop the Hoot Owl by getting me out of the picture. But if you want to keep on trying, it's you own funeral. I've only one thing to ask of you: try to play the white man, Brandon, and fight your own fights!"

His face was dark with rage, now, and he emphasized his last words by downward thrusts of clenched hands along his thighs.

Brandon smiled lightly.

"You're a queer young man," he remarked. "You dream in broad daylight and with your eyes open."

"A peculiarly detailed dream, Brandon! I've said all I have to say about the job and about myself but there is another matter left to be mentioned while I'm here. I won't even utter her name in your hearing, but any man who would pull a trick like you did and involve a girl . . . Brandon, a snake's belly is sky-high compared to you!"

And that touched the well-springs of rage that had been dammed back until the moment.

"You fool!" the man said heavily. The words came like the first break in a levee; slow, sluggish words. . . . And then, like the following toss of foam was the frothing rage in his scream. "You fool! I'll drive you out of this country! I'll hang your operation up for the crows to pick! I'll string the bones of this timber and your own bones across this country!" He swung his arms in wide, wild gestures.

He stopped, sobbing for breath, and his teeth clicked in an agony of passion.

"Dawn? Not mention her name? Well, I will. . . . She's mine, you fool, body and soul! She's been mine for years. . . . Because she smiled at you, because she played with you don't think she's interested, fool! She's—"

He swayed backward as Elliott lurched toward him, but their bodies did not lock.

White and trembling, Ben stayed his own rush.

"No! . . . Don't want to brawl over her," he choked. "But if you mention her name to me again I'm likely to lose my head and tear your hide off your carcass!"

His rage was so high, so holy, that the fear it inspired carried through Brandon's frenzy and the man stood silent, perhaps in awe.

Ben relaxed.

"Now," he said quietly, "I've just one thing to ask, Brandon. It's this: fight your own battles!"

He turned on his heel and slammed the door behind him.

CHAPTER XI

Ben began unblanketing his team with the haste of high temper but before he had finished Able Armitage hailed him from across the street and came hurrying through the rutted snow.

The old justice's face was marked by an expression of concern and he came close before he spoke.

"I hear Red Bart Delaney's in town."

Ben nodded grimly.

"Came to see me yesterday."

"No!"

"Yeah. Took a long look at me . . . over the sights of a rifle."

"Ben! Why, son!"

Elliott laughed mirthlessly and told what had happened in the Hoot Owl chopping the day before.

"So he's gotten down to the hiring of a killer!" Able looked anxiously into Ben's face. "Son . . . It can't go on. Timber or no timber; success or failure for the Hoot Owl, you've got to think of yourself!"

"I'm doing that. I've been to see Brandon and tried to drive him into the open. That's all I ask of him; that he fights fair."

"And if he won't, what?"

"Then I'll have to smoke him out!"

Able clicked his tongue.

"Benny, your way of doing things scares me! Why, this can't go on. It mustn't! It's your own affair, for sure, when he tried to shoot you down, but maybe, perhaps, possibly, I'm going to beg you to be careful. So long as Delaney's in the country you've got to keep low. Get back to camp; stay there; let us pick some man I can trust to follow Bart and Brandon night and day so you'll not be caught!"

"No." Ben shook his head resolutely. "I'll go on about my business as I should. I've never run yet and don't like to start any fast foot work now."

"But it's your life that's at stake, Ben! Don't be silly. That's what recklessness is: downright silly! That's not like you. Why, not taking precautions in this thing is like monkeying with a high tension wire."

"No good, Able. I couldn't hold up my head if I hid out after the play I've made."

So Able was forced to give up after a time and shuffled up the street, drawing off his mitten again and rubbing his face briskly with his palm.

He had only reached his office and was unlocking the door when Aunt Em, walking grimly as if with a definite purpose, approached.

"Good morning—" he began.

"Forget the palaver, Able Armitage!" the woman said sharply. "You're in trouble. So are we all, maybe. That's why I came to see you. Is it true what they say that this Red Bart Delaney has showed up here in Tincup?"

"As true as disease or death or anything else unpleasant."

"That's what I'd heard! Do I have to guess why he's come?"

Able untied his scarf and shook his head sadly.

"No, Em. Your first guess will be right. And he took a shot at Benny yesterday!"

"And missed, I'd judge from the look of him just now. But if he's still here there'll be a next time; and he won't miss then. Did you do your duty and send the boy to some safe place?"

"So you couldn't make him listen to reason!" she muttered. "Well, if you can't, I can't. And, us failing, there's only one other who would have a ghost of a show."

"Dawn?"

She nodded. "Dawn could. But she won't. . . . She won't go to him now. She wouldn't even listen to me talk about him, she's in such a state. She's up to the ears in love with Ben Elliott or I've got three legs! And then to have that scandalous woman do what she did and upset it all!"

She sat down heavily in a chair and drew a great breath.

"I don't have to ask you or any other man about Ben Elliott, Able! I know the clean and decent folks when I see 'em. I'd bet my reputation as a Christian woman on that boy! That piece of play acting at the dance was some of Nick Brandon's work, you can bet your last red cent! I had to give him a piece of my mind just for relief the other day and, goodness me, what a look he give me! Why, Able, that man's worse than ever I thought! My, oh, my! He gave me a look that like to froze the blood right in my veins, after all the years of palaver and soft talkin' I've listened to from him!

"Well, what I'm gettin' at is this: The boy's in danger of bein' murdered every minute of day and night unless he takes your advice. There's no one left to try to talk him into being careful but Dawn. And how am I going to get her to see her duty when she goes into a cryin' fit every time his name's mentioned? Yes, sir. Every time she hears his name."

"She doesn't yet see that the affair was a put-up job, then?"

"See? She can't see anything, Able Armitage! Put yourself in her place. Suppose you were a young girl who's had the things to bear that she has all her life; and suppose you fell in love for the first time; and suppose that young man was accused o' such nastiness right in public with everybody listening and gawping? Would you stop to figure that the reason he seemed guilty was natural? That the thing was so far fetched from the truth and such a shock that he was all kerflummoxed? I should say you wouldn't! You'd do just what she's doin'; make yourself all sick with chills and fever by cryin'!"

She twitched at the skirts of her cloak irritably and glared at the old justice as though he were a sworn enemy instead of a friend.

"What ails her is shock. She ain't got over the shock yet and every time his name or anything else about him is mentioned it sets her off again. She'll get over it, give her time. But then she'll be so humiliated to think she didn't use her reason that she won't be herself for another spell. And she should be herself now! There ain't any time to lose. She should patch up her misunderstanding with him right today—right this hour—and use her influence to persuade him to keep low. But how it's to be done I'd like to know. For Lord's sake, Able, ain't you got a single suggestion?"

The justice had been stuffing light wood into his stove during this. Now he touched a match to the tinder, opened the drafts and stood with hands behind him, rusty overcoat unbuttoned and drooping, deep in thought.

"It's difficult to get anyone in her state to use reason. Maybe the shock of knowing that Ben's life is in danger would be a counter irritant to this other shock. Maybe not. If the affair of last week could be cleared up, if Dawn could be shown that this Lydia woman was only carrying out a plan . . . But I wonder . . ."

Aunt Em stiffened in her chair. She looked hard at Able and her eyes narrowed a trifle.

"You see," he resumed, "if the girl—"

"Hold on, Able Armitage!" she cut in, holding up a hand in warning. "Hold on, now! I've got to think. . . . Got to think, I tell you! And I can't think while you carry on your gabble! You leave me alone, now. . . . Keep your tongue still. . . . They say a woman's tongue is hung in the middle and loose at both ends. . . . But . . . Yum . . ." As she pressed one hand over her eyes her words dwindled to unintelligible mumblings.

"I've got it!" she cried excitedly after a moment. "I've got it, now! You stay right here, Able! You stay until I came back. If it works, it works. . . . If it don't, it'll be time to talk some more!"

She moved resolutely to the door, left the office and strode down the street. People of Tincup watched her pass; people she had known for years spoke to her and drew no response, not even so much as a glance or a nod. On past the bank, the post office, the pool room. . . . On beyond all the stores, on down to the depot.

There, on the platform, she stood a long interval staring across the tracks to that short row of house on Section Thirty-Seven. The station agent came out of the office and looked at Em in surprise.

"Hello!" he cried. "What brings you down here before—"

"Homer," she cut in grimly, "in which one of them nasty places does this Lydia woman live?"

"Why-why . . . Why, now should I know?" he evaded as a red flush crept up from his collar. "In the one at this end, I think. I'm not sure, of course. . . . I think she does, though. . . . She . . ."

But he no longer had a listener. Resolutely, slowly with something like defiant majesty, the woman crossed the tracks, with never another word to her informant and never a look to right or left. Her head was up, her mouth set, and her long nose wrinkled as if at a disgusting odor. A woman up by the stores shaded her eyes and peered at the moving figure and stared and stopped. Aunt Em Coburn, headed for Thirty-Seven! Why, it couldn't be!

But Aunt Em mounted the steps. She rapped at length and vigorously on the scarred panel of the door. She went within, leaving a dozen long-distance watchers to wonder.

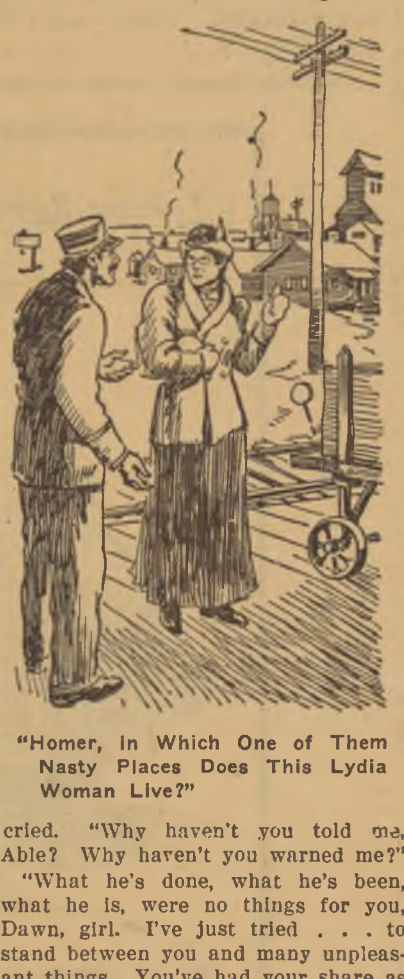
It was long before she emerged and then . . . Ah, then Tincup had a sight to see, a subject for speculation! For by Aunt Em's side moved the woman Lydia, collar of her fur coat high about her face as if to hide the traces of tears which hastily applied powder could not eradicate.

Tears from those hard eyes? Nothing less! For women know women and before Aunt Em had talked to this outcast five minutes she had discovered the weakness in her shame, the clean spot left in her heart. And how Emma Coburn could talk! She talked that clean spot to a growing, glowing, glorious thing. She talked Lydia out of her house, across the tracks; talked her into that slow, unashamed, almost flagrant march up the main street; talked her out of all but one look of misgiving at the windows of Nicholas Brandon's offices. . . . And around the corner and in beneath the hemlocks which whispered above the snug white house. They entered, where Dawn McManus had hidden since the woman's words sent her flying from the dance hall to the sanctuary of Aunt Em's understanding arms.

* * * * * * *

All the way out to camp Dawn snuggled close against Able in his worn old buffalo coat. Now and again she trembled a bit; once she cried softly a few minutes. But much of the time she talked.

"To think it was the man I used to call Uncle who did that thing!" she cried. "Why haven't you told me, Able? Why haven't you warned me?"



"Homer, in Which One of Them Nasty Places Does This Lydia Woman Live?"

"What he's done, what he's been, what he is, were no things for you, Dawn, girl. I've just tried . . . to stand between you and many unpleasant things. You've had your share as it was."

"I could have stood this one more," she replied, stoutly enough. "It hasn't been so bad these last few years, knowing that everybody thinks my father a murderer. I'd just gotten myself above that and now . . . and now . . ."

"What now?" Able asked gently.

She looked at him through tears.

SYNOPSIS

Ben Elliott—from "Yonder"—arrives at the lumbering town of Tincup, with Don Stuart, old, very sick man, whom he has befriended. Nicholas Brandon, the town's leading citizen, resents Stuart's presence, trying to force him to leave, and Elliott, resenting the act, knocks him down. Judge Able Armitage hires him to run the one lumber camp, the Hoot Owl, that Brandon has not been able to grab. This belongs to Dawn McManus, whose father has disappeared with a murder charge hanging over his head. Brandon sends Duval to beat up Ben, and Ben throws him out of camp. Don Stuart dies, leaving a letter for Elliott "to be used when the going becomes too tough." Ben refuses to open the letter, believing he can win the fight by his own efforts. Fire breaks out in the mill. Ben, when the flames are subdued, discovers it was started with gasoline. Elliott gets an offer for logs, that will provide money to tide him over. But a definite time is set. Ben discovers Dawn McManus is not a child, as he had supposed, but a beautiful young woman. The railroad bridge over which the Hoot Owl lumber must pass is blown up. By superhuman efforts Ben builds a new bridge and himself drives the train over the rickety structure to Tincup, making the delivery with only a few minutes to spare. Brandon compels a woman (known as "Lydia") who is in his power, to accuse Elliott of misconduct with a girl. At a dance to which Elliott escorts Dawn, Lydia makes public her charges. Overwhelmed, Elliott can only make a feeble denial. Dawn, apparently believing him guilty, leaves the dance without waiting for him. While in the woods, Elliott is fired on, and drops, seemingly dead, but his fall has been a ruse to make his enemy believe him dead. The would-be killer is proved to be Red Bart Delaney, notorious desperado.

Hay-Wire Does Not Mean Same Among Lumbermen

Individual in all things, New England has its own meaning for a word used in various parts of the country as slang. Elsewhere "hay-wire" may be synonymous with "erratic" or a "little mad." In Dr. Frank Vizetelly's records of the vernacular the slang use of the phrase "gone hay-wire" is defined as signifying something or somebody "gone wrong." In Maine's North Woods the serious implications of that usage are fully understood.

No greater slur can be cast upon a lumberman's equipment than to say "It's a hay-wire outfit." Hay-wire is used in temporary repairs. The man who thus employs it is foresighted and ingenious, but the man who habitually uses hay-wire instead of making permanent repairs is shiftless.

The hay for the lumbermen's horses comes bound in bales. When these bales are broken the wise teamster saves for emergencies the hay-wire which held them together. A good "toter" would not start his team on a trip without taking hay-wire any more than he would set forth without an ax or a pail.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Do you find that the batter sticks to the spoon when you make dumplings? The next time you make them, try this hint: Each time you make a dumpling dip your spoon into cold water. This will prevent the batter from sticking to the spoon and will save time and annoyance in the long run.

Mr. W. W. Scott of Birmingham, who has had charge of The Montevallo Times for the last six months gives up the management of the paper to look after business interests in Birmingham.

We will appreciate the continued cooperation and courtesey that has been shown the Times, alike by the merchants of Montevallo who have liberally suported the publication by using it as an advertising medium and by the public that has subscribed and read it.

The Times has faith in Montevallo, in Shelby county, in Alabama, and hopes to prosper with its folks at home.

This publication is allied with no faction and no interests; its sole aim is dedicated to Montevallo and Shelby county and the interests of our people. The members of its staff will appreciate your interests and your support and hope, by service to this section, to merit the friendship of our people.

C. Blan Spenny, a member of the Tiimes staff will assume management of the paper.

No man should criticise another because of his physical disability. Many people who have been afflicted have had more brains than most of those who speak in such terms of them. Helen Keller, the world-renowned blind woman, stands out as a fine example of those who have overcome difficulties. President Roosevelt stands out in pre-eminence as a man who has fought long and hard to overcome infantile paralysis and he has few equals in ability among the leaders of the world. We should be charitable toward the afflicted always

FARMER BUYING POWER

Nothing reveals the improved condition and increased buying power of the farmer quiet so strikingly as some figures just issued by a large agricultural publication.

For example, to buy a certain low priced automobile, the farmer today pays 626 bushels of wheat. Two years ago the same streamlined model, if it had been in existence then, would have cost him 1,455 bushels, the yield from two and one third as much acreage. A farm tractor costing him fifty-nine 200 pound hogs today would have cost him 131 such hogs in 1933.

Probably most surprising of all, however, is the comparison of prices in the case of a gasoline powered washer. For it the farmer pays today 117 bushels of corn. Two years ago it cost him 712 bushels, more six times as much..

Undoubtedly there is a disposition to take for granted those things and conditions by which we are constantly surrounded. It is only when they are put up to us in some interesting or different new way that we fully comprehend and appreciate what is taking place.

Something more than $800,000,000 will be spent by the United States for military purposes during the fiscal year beginning July 1st.

President Roosevelt will undergo the acid test of his administration during the next twelve months, but we believe he can take it and come out with that same old contagious affectionate (and by the way, vote-getting) grin.

When he went into office he did many things that had not been done before; he is still doing things of a somewhat politically unorthodox nature, but he doing something.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt opened National Better Homes Week at the Girl Scout Little House in Washington D.C. Saturday, April 27. Home Economics in various phases was featured by Girl Scouts from the District of Columbia during the week. The Washington program was followed generally by girl scouts in other parts of the country.

The Pioneer Girl Scout troop of Montevallo entertained with a tea on Easter Sunday afternoon. About fifty guests were invited to this social affair and numbered the parents and teachers of the girls.

Gene—Has the depression hit you yet?

Bill—I'll say it has! First, I lost my job and went back to the Old Man's to live; sent my children to the orphan's home; my wife went back to her mother, and I shot my dog.

Gene—That's bad.

Bill—Yes, sir, if times get any worse, I'm afraid I'll have to give upmy car.

LARGEST PRINTING JOB

What is perhaps the largest single order of printed matter ever produced began rolling out of Chicago a few days ago, being the spring and summer catalogue of large mail order house.

The first shipment to be distrbuted—which was only one-third of the total—filled 102 freight cars and consisted of 3,000 tons of catalogues.

The entire issue will weigh approximately 9,000 tons, or 18 million pounds.

This supreme advertising effort which is being imitated on a somewhat smaller scale by smaler mail order houses, is directed largely to prospective customers of the smaller towns and rural sections. It means that these large concerns believe that there is trade to be had, and that the way to get it is through advertising.

In combatting the encroachments of mail order houses, local merchants have many advantages. The customer can see the goods before he buys, there are no long waits for deliveryy, no disappointments or dissatisfaction over goods which do not come up to fancy catalogue descriptions. Quality considered, the local merchant's prices are usually as reasonable as those of the mail order house.

The average local merchant's handicap consists chiefly in his own failure to go after trade through persistent and adequate advertising, and the mail order houses take advantage of his failure to use this effective weapo.n—Florence Herald.

DEFECTIVE VISION HANDICAP IN STUDY

Three Million School Children in U. S. Afflicted.

New York City. — Approximately 3,000,000 school children in the United States—one-eighth of the entire school population—are handicapped in their education by defective eyesight, it is disclosed in the report of a joint committee of the National Education association and the American Medical association co-operating with the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness.

Farsightedness is the most common visual defect among American school children, according to the report, prepared under the direction of Dr. Thomas D. Wood of Columbia university. Astigmatism is next in frequency, and nearsightedness is third; other eye defects mentioned are cross-eyes and inflammation of the eyelid lining.

"The importance of good eyesight among school children cannot be overestimated," says the report. "We have come to recognize that defective vision or disease in the eyes of the child not only may have detrimental influence on his school progress, but may react upon his general health and upon his adjustment to his school, his playmates, and even to his family. This recognition has given new impetus to the work of discovering and correcting visual defects among children, beginning with the preschool age.

Close Work Distresses.

"The farsighted child is not usually discomforted by seeing at a distance. It is the close eye work that distresses him. The printed page which the normal eye reads without undue muscular strain at a distance of 14 inches may appear alternately blurred and clear to the farsighted child.

"To the nearsighted child, objects beyond a certain distance appear to be indistinct or hazy in outline, and if the child is very nearsighted he may even pass his playmates on the street without recognizing them. If the book is too large or too heavy to hold up to his face, he brings his head nearer to the page. Such a position is not only harmful to the eye and fatiguing to its muscles, but is also fatiguing to the muscles of the neck and shoulders."

Calling attention to the fact that children with cross-eyes often become extremely sensitive and self-conscious because of the jibes of playmates and the thoughtless remarks of adults, the report says: "The sense of inferiority so often developed in children with squint may breed undesirable personality traits and unhealthful mental attitudes toward life. It cannot be overstressed that the most satisfactory results are obtained when the child with squaint—no matter how young—is placed under the care of an ophthalmologist as soon as the defect is recognized."

Eye Health Urged.

In its concluding chapter, the report urges particularly that the school's provision for eye health should include medical supervision and special educational facilities for "children with such serious eye difficulties that after everything possible has been done for them they either cannot see well enough to profit by the usual school equipment or may be harmed by so doing." The report continues: "Probably one in 500 of the school population comes under this classification. This group has been designated as 'partially seeing.' They carry on their close eye work in sight-saving classes under the direction of specially trained teachers, but join their normally seeing compan-

Expecting record summer motor travel this spring and summer in the Southland, William E. Smith, president of the Standard Oil Company (Kentucky), has arranged immediate distribution in this region of a new kind of summer motor oil made by the revolutionary Clearosol Process. Mr. Smith is shown here receiving from Miss Beatrice Drader the first can of the new oil to arrive by airplane.

A NEW kind of summer motor oil refined by the Clearosol Process, which has been called the most revolutionary development in the history of the petroleum industry, was announced today by W. E. Smith, president of the Standard Oil Company (Kentucky). The new Mobiloil will be available throughout this area this week.

"The process 'washes' out carbon and gum forming impurities from the crude oil," Mr. Smith explained. "As a result the oil is free from those weak and unstable elements which burn up with engine heat. Motorists will be able to drive farther this summer and spend less in oil purchases.

"The Clearosol Process developed by the Socony-Vacuum Oil Company is really simplicity itself, although it was discovered only after years of research by chemists and refinery engineers seeking a new way to improve lubricating oils to meet the demands of increased motor car performance. Two cleansing fluids or solvents are used. One of them, cresylic acid, dissolves and settles the natural impurities present in the finest crude petroleum. The other, propane, absorbs the valuable parts of the oil. Since propane is normally a gas and must be compressed before it turns to a liquid, all of the valuable parts of the motor oil are retained and the propane is set free as a gas when the propane-oil mixture reaches room temperature.

"Tests in the laboratory and on the road with the old-type oils showed that the engine valve chambers were coated with gum after 100 hours of operation. Pistons were blocked and rings were stuck with muck. This gum and muck was formed by impurities which the old-type refining method by filtration or acid treatment failed to remove from the crude oil. The new summer Mobiloil has the highest resistance to gumming of any oil yet developed, because the impurities have been 'washed' out of the crude petroleum by the action of the solvents."

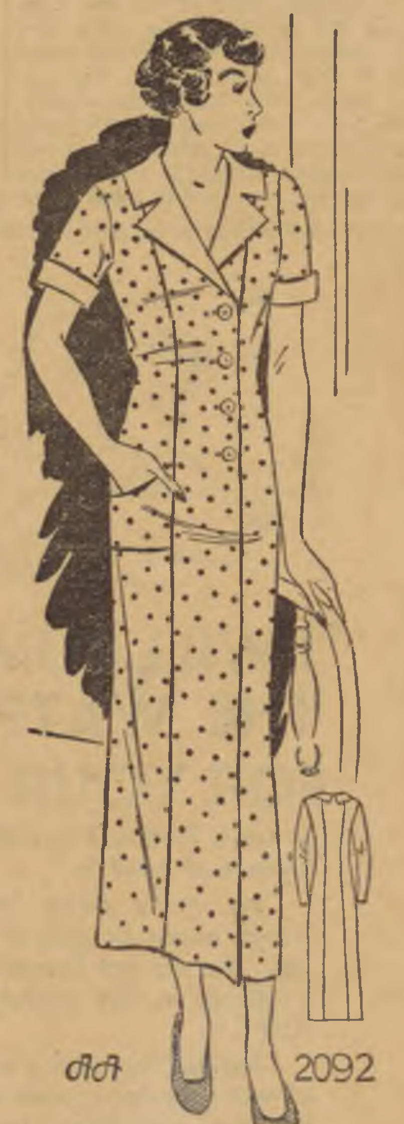
Perfection in Its Simplicity

PATTERN 2092



Every now and then some simple idea comes along and creates a furor—and every one wonders why it hadn't happened before! Like this perfectly grand house dress which has been designed. Its long coat lines make one appear slim as a rail while at work about the house, and it gives much freedom of movement. Its greatest feature, of course, is the fact you can slip it on and not be bothered by mussing your hair or twisting your neck—just a dive into it and it's on. It is attractive in colored cotton broadcloth, percale or pique print, substantial materials lending themselves well to its coat lines.

Pattern 2092 is available in sizes 16, 18, 20, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 takes 4¼ yards 36 inch fabric and ¾ yard contrasting. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted
by William Bruckart

National Press Building   Washington, D. C.

Washington.—Much ado is being made around Washington again over lobbyists. It is true that there are now perhaps more lobbyists in Washington than at any time in the last fifteen years. It is true they are influencing legislation, and I think it can be said without fear of contradiction that lobbyists are responsible for a portion of the balking tactics in congress.

Lobbyists Active

Existence of this unusual condition in Washington carries more significance, however, than just the fact that special interests or individual interests are trying to protect themselves. From a good many sources I gather the opinion that the condition means the President's power has weakened.

It is to be remembered that when Mr. Roosevelt carried his New Deal into the White House and led the largest Democratic majority ever to control the national legislative body, that very fact thwarted lobbying. Very few of the so-called special interests had the courage to button hole individual representatives or senators to plead their cause. These representatives and senators were looking to White House leadership; their fate rested on the New Deal, and they were unable accurately to gauge what public sentiment would be if they openly disagreed with Presidential orders. In those days, the corridors of the Capitol and the house and senate office buildings were virtually deserted of petitioners—for that is what a lobbyist is.

To the extent that lobbyists operated in the early days of the Roosevelt administration, they sought to influence Presidential decision and the activities of the brain trust and underlings who drafted the Presidential programs. Once these programs had been submitted to congress, the opposition to them largely subsided and members jumped to the crack of the Presidential whip. As stated above, individual members were afraid to go against White House orders and lobbyists were afraid to combat the President's popularity.

But a year ago, various interests throughout the country began to sense a feeling that they could again talk with members of congress safely. They began organizing their representations here as they formerly had enjoyed, and little by little broadened the scope of their activities. A singular part about the present condition is the mushroom growth of the lobbyists. Supplementing their growth has been an unusual fearlessness. They are busy pushing all kinds of causes, good and bad.

Some forces estimate there are close to five hundred different groups and organizations actively petitioning congress to do this or that according to their lights. There are such gigantic lobbies as that of organized labor, agriculture and the American Legion. There are lobbies for religious and racial groups. The power interests at the moment bulk large with their lobbying activities. Individual lines of industry have their representatives here in numbers. The railroads, for example, have headquarters here for their Association of American Railroads and it is also the headquarters for the Shortline Railroad association. The bankers maintain a legislative committee of the American Bankers' association here, and even scientific groups have their people treading water in the halls of congress, watching and waiting to be sure that nothing detrimental to their interests is done by the legislators.

* * *

It will be recalled that several weeks ago Mr. Roosevelt let loose one of the bitterest messages he has ever sent to congress in denunciation of the activities of the power lobby. At that time, the vicious character of his accusations against the power interests was attributed by many observers to his intense feeling that public utility holding companies should be abolished. He felt that cliques of financiers were taking advantage of innocent investors and he wanted to tell the country about it.

Sees Power Waning

Now, however, it develops that he was shooting not only at the power group but at all so-called special interests which were seeking to protect themselves from what they regarded as flagrant violations of property rights of the established business practices. It must be said that for a few days, the President's message did have the effect of slowing down lobbying activities but the lobbyists had tasted of their own power. They are not to be frightened by any Presidential attack nor by the threat of Senator Black of Alabama to force through legislation compelling lobbyists in Washington to register. As a matter of cold fact, it is my conviction that Senator Black will find himself thoroughly circumvented in any move he may make to press for action on what is generally regarded as a ridiculous piece of legislation. It is a thirty-year-old proposal, anyway.

It all goes to show that, at least among those with the courage of their convictions, President Roosevelt is not as powerful as he was in the first year of his reign. Balking tactics in congress over the public works relief bill was but the outward sign of courage underneath. I have reported to you heretofore that there were mutterings and expressions of discontent within the President's vast majority in the house and senate. While the malcontents are not openly criticizing the President, they are able to accomplish their purpose by delay and disagreement over what ordinarily would be very minor details.

I believe it is the consensus also that the activities of petitioners for their rights are responsible to a large extent for the creation of numerous blocs in congress. It has been observed by numerous publicists that if there is danger of Fascism in the United States, it lies in this rise of blocs in congress. The natural result is to replace and break up the two old established parties. Thus far in this session there has been evidence time after time of bloc activities, one against another. This condition results in legislative trades, not all of which result in good or even well-written legislation.

When the President came through the biennial election last fall with his majorities increased, there were those who insisted that he would have his will with congress and no questions asked. They did not reckon, however, with the potential strength of the various interests watching congressional activities. I do not believe that a careful analysis of the activities of most of these lobbyists will show improper relations between them and members of congress. They are simply asserting the right of every individual, namely, the privilege to tell his representative or senator what his opinion is. Certainly, there is a growing feeling that Mr. Roosevelt gained little or nothing when he attacked the power interests, and over their shoulder all other representation in Washington.

* * *

Now that President Roosevelt has title to $4,800,000,000 to spend pretty much as he pleases, the question is heard around Washington more and more frequently, what is he going to do with it? The truth is that administration plans for utilizing this vast sum of money are so nebulous that no one can tell, even the officials themselves, to what uses it will be put. One hears about attacking the problem of soil erosion so that the destruction by dust storms will occur no more, and there is talk of many public works projects. When one tries to find out details of these, however, he is promptly confronted by a stone wall, either of silence or of a frank statement that only the outlines have thus far been considered.

How Will It Be Spent?

Conversations over luncheon tables in Washington seem to indicate that actual spending of this money in any appreciable sum will not get under way for some months. In fact, there seems to be ground for belief that nothing of substantial character will take place in a spending way before next winter. And, if that is true the comment suggests, the great appropriation will be effective only in a political way next spring and summer.

It should be remembered that the amount voted the President in this one resolution which is to be spent practically at his direction is greater than the total expenditure of the federal government for any year from 1922 to 1931.

* * *

With further references to lobbying activities, it is made to appear that two organizations have done an especially good job. I refer to the operations of the American Legion office in Washington and its fight for the veterans' bonus, and the activity of the various agricultural and farm organizations who have been fighting off certain phases of railroad legislation.

Effective Lobbying

The farmers, according to the best information I can get, are opposed to federal regulation of interstate bus and truck business because they feel the proposed legislation will hamper farm-to-market hauling. I suspect that the bus and truck group have persuaded the farm representatives to oppose regulatory measures for busses and trucks on the basis of misunderstanding. I have made numerous inquiries of legislative drafting experts and of house and senate leaders respecting the point at issue and all have assured me that the proposed federal regulation will in no way apply to farm-to-market hauling.

While the point made here is not at all important and when farm operators of trucks understand it they will doubtless shy away from the position they have taken, it illustrates how one organization will attract many followers to its ranks who actually ought not be there.

Now as to the bonus proposition, it ought to be said that the Roosevelt administration is in a hole. So well has the American Legion done its job that there is no doubt in my mind at the moment respecting the outcome. There will be bonus legislation passed by congress at this session. Whether it will be signed or vetoed by President Roosevelt depends entirely upon the nature of the bill as it finally is passed.

Watch Your Eye-Lens Frightened to Death
All Possess Language
Eating Bark and Earth

Arthur Brisbane

Important news for life insurance companies. A tendency to old age or early death is inherited, according to Dr. Felix Bernstein of Columbia university, who talked to the National Academy of Science in Chicago. A scientist can tell how old you are, physically, by examining the lens of your eye. It always shows signs of hardening before fifty; the extent of the hardening decides how old you really are.

The rest of your body—brain, heart and all the rest—grows old about as rapidly as the eye-lens does.

Leaving out accidents and attacks by disease germs, there is a sort of "pre-destination" in the length of life.

Two brothers, fifteen and ten years of age, with a young friend, were going to an entertainment last Christmas night. George Bond and Carl McMurty of Poplar Bluff, Mo., thought it would be amusing to frighten the children by running after them, telling them, "You will never live to get there."

The two older boys "got there." The little ten-year-old boy, James Ainley, dropped dead of fright as the men pursued him. A sensible jury decides that the two men shall spend six months in jail and pay $100 fine for their "joke." The jury might well have made it ten years, for it was stupid manslaughter. There is nothing more brutal, cruel or more completely worthy of a genuine "yahoo" than frightening children.

Secretary of Interior Ickes, who also possesses the gift of forcible speech, calls Senator Long "a ranting demagogue," describes, more gently, one other well known broadcaster, and rebukes, without mentioning his name, Doctor Townsend, whom he accuses of arousing false hopes in the "underprivileged."

Senator Huey Long, his language never failing him, able to speak his mind freely in the senate, addressing that august body, describes the secretary of interior as "Lord High Chamberlain Ickes, the chinch-bug of Chicago."

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace he called the "Lord Destroyer, the ignoramus of Iowa."

We complain of our depression with good cause. We might find queer consolation in reading about miserable inhabitants of Formosa, property of Japan, inhabited chiefly by Chinese, who made up 80 per cent of the sufferers and victims in the recent earthquake.

In Formosa, men, women and children have been stripping the bark from elm trees and eating it and they may be seen on barren fields, pulling up wild grass by the roots, washing and eating the roots, as well as the grass itself. Many have died from eating bran mixed with earth and water, the earth causing death by intestinal stoppage.

Those poor creatures have a real depression, with no rich government to pour out billions for jobs, relief, dole, etc.

The American Philosophical society, gathered in Philadelphia, learns from Doctor Slipher, director of the Lowell observatory at Flagstaff, Ariz., that to people on the planet Mars, if any are there, our earth is a blue planet.

If those Martians will continue watching us, until some European or Asiatic country sends a few thousand planes in our direction, they will see this corner of the earth a deeper and darker blue than ever. What a lesson we shall learn some day if we continue with our eyes shut!

Newspaper editors, that ought to know something about prosperity, gathered in New York from all over the country, tell you they see a "business pickup," better times are coming. That is a cheerful prediction.

Some boys in high schools, and bigger boys in colleges, recently organized a "strike" to express their horror of war.

War is horrible; it should be, and eventually will be, unnecessary. But there is some good in all evil, and young students and others should reflect on past wars and what modern civilization owes to them.

Germany wants colonies, and is embarrassed by the fact that this would mean taking in a great many black ladies and gentlemen that by no stretch of the imagination could be called "Aryans." The German government announces that, while it could not admit negroes to German citizenship, as Britain does in her colonies, black colonial negroes would be "Schutzbefohlene," with every right except the right to adopt Aryan strut.

Roman Substitute for the Modern Newspaper

Ancient Rome had a "Stock Exchange" and almost every citizen in the Eternal City, in the Second century B. C., owned shares in some joint stock company.

These Roman corporations were formed to collect taxes, loan money, construct public works, and exploit the mines seized by the conquering armies of the Caesars in Gaul, Spain, Africa and Asia.

It is hard to see how the Romans got on without stock quotations in the newspapers, but Caesar's publication of the Acta Diurna, or proceedings of the senate and assembly, would take the place of our newspapers, and the crowds which gathered at the points where these documents were posted simply parallel the throngs that collect in front of a bulletin in the window of a newspaper office today.

Couriers were constantly arriving from the agents of corporations in the provinces with the latest news of industrial and financial enterprises.

There is no evidence of an organized Roman stock exchange, but there was a row of banking offices along one side of the Forum which probably did a brisk business in stock loans.

Rome had its speculators as we have today, and in 191 B. C., a character in a play referred to a "corner in grain." There was also an "oil scandal" in Rome when speculators tried to gain control of the olive oil market.—Pearson's Weekly.

ORD SPRING IS AN OUTSTANDING FEATURE

The traverse spring, an outstanding feature of Ford cars ever since they have been on th market, has been newly applied to the Ford V-8 for 1935, according to Towery Motor Co. local Ford dealer.

"On the 1935 Ford the front spring is 7 1-8 inches longer and 1-4 of an inch wider," he says. "The rear spring is slightly longer than the 1934 car, and both front and rear spring are 'softer' to improve riding comfort. The spring leaves have been widened and tapered towards the ends to give greater flexibility and eliminate the possibility of squeaking."

According to the local Ford dealer, the transverse spring suspension is particularly adapted to modern car operation a it provides greater stability on curves at high speeds and eliminates sidesway. This type of construction, he says, is responsible for the "free action on all four wheels" feature of the Ford V-8, whereby both front and rear wheels glide over uneven places in the highway while the chassis and body of the car remain on an "even keel" and provide a smooth, shock-proof ride.

"Another important roadability feature of the 1935 Ford V-8, that makes for ease of control and smoother operation," said Towery Motor Co., "is the continued use of radius rods to give Torque Tube drive. As in the 1934 Ford V-8 the radius rods perform the function of carrying the drivstrain, leaving the springs, which are mounted on extensions of the raidus rods, free to serve their sole purpose of supporting the body and cushioning the ride."

The roadability of the new Ford V-8, according to the dealer, is contributing to its popularity; but, he points out, with all these modern riding improvements, the outstanding feature of this car is its power plant—the only V-8 engine you can buy under two thousand dollars.

EARLY WORM WORST IN APPLE ORCHARD

Cathching the early worm in an apple orchard goes far toward saving fruit from destruction. The death of 1 from the first coddling moth brood say entomologists of the United States Department of Agriculture, is, in normal years, equivalent to the death of 5, or 10, or even more, worms of the second brood.

During the first part of the season the codling moth worms must travel across a good deal of leaf surface to reach the fruit. In doing this they are bound to pick up fatal doses of poison from spray. Many of the worms oft he later broods, however, will hatch from eggs laid directly on apples and can burrow into the fruit without having to cross any great expanse of sprayed surface.

Early spraying is to combat the codling moth—the most serious apple insect pest in the United States—has another advantage. The residue it leaves will be removed by nature That left by later sprayings makes it necessary to wash the fruit before it can go to market.

Hitting the tree tops is essential in early spraying, the entomologists add. If the high branches are missed, the worms there have a good chance to build up large families as the season advances.

Visitors of ours who had driven up from South Georgia said Montevallo was one of the prettiest towns they had seen. Among the things they admired were thetrees, the architecture of Alabama College and the flower gardens. Then they went on to envy us the climate, and the beautiful scenery. Were we proud of our adopted ttown!

Americans Find Way to Make Paint From Shells

Moscow.—Two American workmen in the Soviet Union have developed a process to manufacture paint and enamel out of sea-shells found on the shores of the Baltic and the Caspian in almost unlimited quantities. They are Joe Gershon and Fred Jaeger, "specialists" painters employed by the government trust Spetstroi. They have applied for quarters to try out the process, which, if successful, will supply the Soviet with much-needed paint at low prices.

Hen in Oklahoma Defies AAA Reduction Program

Okemah, Okla.—Jess Johnson has a hen which is going against the AAA reduction programs.

Although she apparently has reduced her working time 50 per cent, Johnson says she is still continuing with the same rate of egg production.

All her eggs are larger than the average size, and one laid this week "beats them all." The egg shell was three and a half inches long. Inside the large egg was another egg, Johnson said, about normal size.

She handles all freight moved by the planes, hauling it to the airport by dog sled in winter. In summer, when ships land on the river, she uses a small motor boat. Helen is saving her money to attend Alaska college at Fairbanks.

Death Valley Skull Shows Up Experts

Washington. — Discovery of the skull of a Titanothere in Death Valley has proved that scientists may be wrong.

Noted scientists had predicted that no fossils ever would be found in the valley. The Titanothere, a gigantic rhinoceros-like animal, apparently belonged to the eocene or oligocene period.

Members of the Death Valley national monument made the discovery. Shortly afterward, a group of scientists from the California Institute of Technology unearthed another skull of the same type of mammal.

It marked the first time that the skull of a Titanothere had been found west of the Rockies. In addition, but once previously had any fossil of this family of mammals been discovered in the region.

Bean Beetle Appears In State

Auburn, Ala.,—With numer

Uburn, Ala.,—With numerous bean beetles already appearing in the state, farmers are likely to lose an entire bean crop unless they take proper steps to control the pests, warns Julian Brown, extension horticulturist.

"To control these insects it is necessary to spray or dust with some kind of stomach poison," says Mr. Brown. "Derris has been found most satisfactory and it will control them if properly applied. Dusting appears more satisfactory than spraying.

"The Derris with 4 per cent rotenone superfine dusting sulphur in the proportion of one part of Derris to seven parts of the sulpher. Some distributors are handling the Derris ready mixed.

'To control the Mexican bean beetle it is necessary that the dust be applied to the underside of the leaves. The bean leaf beetle may be controlled by applying the dust to either side of the leaves. It should be applied while there is moisture on the leaves to aid material in sticking. It is usually necessary to dust every ten days to two weeks during the life of the plants, the frequency of application depending on the amount of rainfall.'"
